of that year he commanded the centre at Jemmapes, and was, says Lamartine, the favourite lieutenant of Dumouriez, the general-in-chief. Having been summoned to appear at the tribunal of the committee of public safety in April, 1793, he escaped across the Belgian frontier with Dumouriez, in whose conspiracy with the Austrians he was implicated. He afterwards wandered as an exile and in disguise through various countries and strange vicissitudes, and was for some months (1794) professor in the College of Reichenau, under the name of M. Chambaud. In 1796 he came for greater safety to the United States, where he travelled more than a year. From 1800 until 1808 the Duke of Orléans resided in England. He married Maria Amelia, daughter of Ferdinand, King of Naples, in 1809. At the restoration of the Bourbons (1814) he returned to France, and was reinstated in his hereditary honours and possessions. When the escape of Bonaparte from Elba became known at Paris, Louis XVIII. appointed the Duke of Orléans commander of the army of the North; but he soon resigned this place. He took little part in public affairs until the revolution of July, 1830, had dethroned Charles X., and a provisional government was formed, under the direction of La Fayette, Lafitte, Guizot, Thiers, and others. A powerful party then urged the claim of Louis Philippe to the throne, while others wished a republic. The scale appears to have been turned by La Fayette, (who did not consider France yet prepared for a republic,) and the crown was offered to the Duke of Orléans by the Deputies and Peers, on the 9th of August, and accepted, with a remodelled constitution. The king called into his cabinet the Duc de Broglie, Count Molé, M. Guizot, and Lafitte. He was soon after recognized by the great powers of Europe. In October, 1830, M. Lafitte became premier, and in March, 1831, was superseded by Casimir Périer. The first part of this reign was disturbed by riots and conspiracies of the Carlists and republicans, and several attempts were made to assassinate the king. In October, 1832, a new ministry was formed, of which Marshal Soult was premier and Guizot and Thiers were members, the majority being Doctrinaires. Frequent changes of the ministry afterwards occurred, by which Count Molé, the Duc de Broglie, Thiers, and Guizot were successively raised to the office of prime minister. In October, 1836, Louis Napoleon made at Strasbourg an abortive attempt to dethrone Louis Philippe, for which he was banished to the United States. Louis Philippe followed a pacific policy, and waged no wars against the great European powers; but his army made important conquests in Algeria. His reign, however, though successful, was not generally popular. It was stigmatized as reactionary, temporizing, "egotistical." The peace which had been the chief merit of this reign was at last imperilled by the impolitic marriage of the king's son, the Duke of Montpensier, to the eventual heiress of the Spanish crown. Electoral reform became the rallying-cry of a plan of agitation concerted by a coalition of republicans, Bonapartists, and royalists in 1847. The forcible opposition of the ministry to this open agitation at reform banquets caused a collision between the troops and the Parisian populace on February 24, 1848. Unwilling to authorize a great slaughter of the people, the king then abdicated in favour of his grandson, Count of Paris; but the republic proclaimed by Lamartine, Arago, and others prevailed. Louis Philippe escaped in disguise to England, where he was kindly received. He died at Claremont, England, in August, 1850, leaving four sons, styled the Duc de Nemours, the Duc de Montpensier, the Prince de Joinville, and the Duc d'Aumale.

Louise de Lorraine, loo'ēz' dẹh lo'rạn', Queen of France, born in 1554, was the daughter of Nicolas, Count de Vaudemont. In 1575 she was married to Henry III., who treated her with neglect. Died in 1601.

Louise de Savoie, loo'ēz' dẹh sȧ'vwȧ', Regent of France, born at Pont d'Ain in 1476, was the daughter of Philip, Duke of Savoy. She married Charles of Orléans, and had a son who became king as Francis I. On his departure to Italy, in 1515, he appointed her regent of the kingdom. She caused the loss of the Milanese by appropriating to herself the money destined to pay the troops, and by her unjust treatment provoked Constable Bourbon to join the enemy. She obtained the regency again in 1524, and retained it during the captivity of the king. In 1529 she negotiated with Margaret of Austria the treaty of Cambray between Francis I. and Charles V. Died in 1532.

Louise (or Luise) Ulrike, loo-ee'zẹh o͝ol're-kẹh, Queen of Sweden, born at Berlin in 1720, was a sister of Frederick the Great of Prussia. She became acquainted with Voltaire, who wrote verses in praise of her agreeable qualities. In 1744 she was married to Prince Adolphus Frederick, who became king in 1751. She founded an Academy of Belles-Lettres at Stockholm in 1753. Died in 1782. Gustavus III. was her son.

Loup, loo, [Lat. SERVA'TUS LU'PUS,] Abbé of Ferrières, is regarded as the most polished writer that France produced in the ninth century. He was born in the diocese of Sens in 805. He was employed by Charles the Bald in important missions, and corresponded with the most eminent men of his time, including several kings. His letters are prized for the light they throw on the events of that period.

Louptière, de la, dẹh lȧ loo'te-aiR', (JEAN CHARLES DE Relongue—rẹh-loNg',) a French poet, born in the diocese of Sens in 1727; died in 1784.

Lourdoueix, looR'doo'ạ', (SOPHIE TESSIER,) a French writer of fiction, born in Paris in 1793. She married M. Lourdoueix, an editor of the "Gazette de France." Among her works is "The Son of his Works," ("Le Fils de ses Œuvres," 2 vols., 1845.) Died in 1859.

Loureiro, de, dȧ lō-rā'e-ro, (JOÃO,) a Portuguese botanist, born about 1715. He practised medicine many years in Cochin China and China, and returned to Portugal after an absence of thirty-six years. His "Flora of Cochin China" (1790) described many new genera, and was esteemed a valuable contribution to botanical science. Died in 1796.

Loutherbourg, loo'tẽR'boor', or Lutherburg, loo'-tẽR-bo͝oRg', (PHILIPPE JACQUES,) a skilful French landscape-painter, born at Strasburg about 1735, was a pupil of Casanova. After working some years in Paris, he removed in 1771 to London, where he painted decorations for the Opera. He excelled in landscapes, battle-pieces, and views on the sea-coast. His execution is remarkable for facility and vigour. He etched some of his own designs. He died in London about 1812.

Louvet, loo'vȧ', (PIERRE,) a mediocre French historian, born at Beauvais in 1617. He wrote histories of Languedoc, Aquitaine, and Provence. Died about 1680.

Louvet, (PIERRE,) a French antiquary, born near Beauvais about 1570; died in 1646.

Louvet de Couvray, loo'vȧ' dẹh koo'vrȧ', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French Girondist orator, born in Paris in 1760. He was elected to the Convention in 1792, and became a prominent member of the Girondist party. In October, 1792, he attacked Marat and Robespierre in a bold and effective speech. He was proscribed with the Girondist chiefs about June 1, 1793, but escaped by flight to Normandy. In April, 1794, he entered Paris, where he concealed himself until the fall of Robespierre. In 1795 he resumed his seat in the Convention, from which he passed into the Council of Five Hundred. He produced several successful romances, comedies, and political tracts. Died in 1797. In reference to the above-named speech, which is inserted in his "History of the Girondists," Lamartine says, "Louvet was one of those men whose political destiny is composed of a single day; but this day conquers futurity for them, because it associates with their name the memory of a sublime talent and a sublime courage."

Louviers, de, dẹh loo've-ȧ', (CHARLES JACQUES,) a French writer, was appointed a member of the council of state by Charles V. in 1376. He is supposed to be the author of the famous "Dream of the Orchardist," ("Songe du Vergier,") the aim of which is to prove that the pope has no temporal power over princes. The book is in the form of a dialogue.

Louville, de, dẹh loo'vèl', (CHARLES AUGUSTE d'Allonville—dȧ'lôN'vèl',) MARQUIS, a French diplomatist, born in 1668. In 1701 he was chosen gentleman of the chamber to Philip V. of Spain, who afterwards employed him in missions to Paris and Rome. Died in 1731.

Louville, de, (JACQUES EUGÈNE d'Allonville,) CHEVALIER, a French astronomer, born in the Chartrain in 1671, was a brother of the preceding. He devoted himself to astronomy, and erected an observatory near Orléans. Having been admitted into the Academy of Sciences, he contributed to it "New Tables of the Sun," "Observations on the Obliquity of the Ecliptic," etc. Died in 1732.

See FONTENELLE, "Éloge de M. Louville."

Louvois, de, dẹh loo'vwȧ', (CAMILLE LETELLIER,) ABBÉ, born in Paris in 1675, was a son of the celebrated minister of war. He was included by Baillet among the "enfants célèbres," and was elected to the French Academy in 1706. He added 30,000 books to the Royal Library. Died in 1718.

Louvois, de, CHEVALIER. See ESTRÉES, D', (LOUIS CÉSAR LETELLIER.)

Louvois, de, (FRANÇOIS MICHEL LETELLIER,) MARQUIS, a powerful French minister of state, born in Paris in 1641, was a son of Michel Letellier, chancellor of France. In 1654 his father, who was then secretary of war, obtained the reversion of that office for Louvois, who, having qualified himself by diligent studies and gained the favour of the king, became sole minister of war in 1666. While Colbert managed the finances and increased the resources of France, Louvois contributed greatly to the military successes of Louis XIV. He supplanted Colbert in the favour of the king, and instigated Louis to persecute the Protestants. By the counsels of this unscrupulous and haughty minister, who was then extremely powerful, the edict of Nantes was revoked in 1685, and the Palatinate was wasted by fire and sword in 1689. The atrocity of the latter measure excited general horror. His insolence at last exhausted the patience of the king. In 1691 Louvois excited the anger of Louis by proposing to burn Treves, and would have been dismissed if he had not died suddenly in the same year. He is censured for having caused the derangement of the finances, and for fomenting the aggressive martial ambition of his master. "He was the greatest adjutant-general, the greatest quartermaster-general, the greatest commissary-general," says Macaulay, "that Europe had seen. He may, indeed, be said to have made a revolution in the art of disciplining, distributing, equipping, and provisioning armies." His son, the Marquis of Barbesieux, was his successor as minister of war.

Louvrex, de, dẹh loo'vrȧ', (MATHIAS GUILLAUME,) a Belgian jurist and historian, born at Liege in 1665; died in 1734.

Lovat, lŭv'ạt, (SIMON Fraser,) LORD, a Scottish Jacobite conspirator, born near Inverness about 1676. At the death of Lord Lovat, who was chief of the Fraser clan, Simon Fraser made unsuccessful attempts to obtain the title and estates. To evade the penalty of some crime, he passed over to France about 1700, and turned a Roman Catholic. Having entered the service of the Pretender, he was sent to Scotland in 1702 to incite the Highlanders to rebellion; but he betrayed his trust, and acted the part of informer against the Jacobites. For this offence he was confined in the Bastille several years. In 1715 Fraser fought against the cause of the Stuarts at Inverness, and was rewarded with the estates of the Frasers and the title of Lord Lovat. In the rebellion of 1745 he was detected in treasonable acts against King George, for which he was executed in London in 1747.

Love, lŭv, (CHRISTOPHER,) a Presbyterian theologian, was born at Cardiff, Wales, in 1618. He began to preach in London in 1644, after which he was a member of the Assembly of Divines. After the death of Charles I., he entered into a conspiracy called Love's Plot, the design of which was to restore Charles II. For this cause he was executed in August, 1651. His Sermons, and other works, were published in three volumes.

Love, (JAMES,) the assumed name of a dramatist and actor, who was a son of Mr. Dance, a London architect. A satire against Walpole having appeared under the title "Are these Things so?" he wrote an answer, entitled "Yes, they are: What then?" for which Walpole gave him a present. He acted at Drury Lane from 1762 until his death, and wrote "Pamela," and other comedies. Died in 1774.

Loveira. See LOBEIRA.

Love'joy, (lŭv'joi,) (ELIJAH P.,) an American clergyman and opponent of slavery, born at Albion, in Maine, in 1802, graduated at Waterville in 1826. He began to edit at Alton, Illinois, about 1836, an anti-slavery paper, called "The Alton Observer." His press was twice destroyed by a pro-slavery mob. While defending his premises at Alton against a third attack, he was shot and mortally wounded, in November, 1837.

Lovejoy, (OWEN,) a brother of the preceding, was born at Albion, Kennebec county, Maine, in 1811. He was employed as minister of a Congregational church at Princeton, Illinois, from 1838 to 1854, and was elected a member of Congress by the Republicans of the third district of Illinois in 1856. He was re-elected in 1858, 1860, and 1862. He was a radical opponent of slavery. Died at Brooklyn, New York, in March, 1864.

Love'lace, (ADA AUGUSTA BYRON,) COUNTESS OF, the only child of the poet Lord Byron, was born in 1815. She was married to the Earl of Lovelace, who was a son of Lord Peter King. Died in 1852.

Lovelace, (RICHARD,) an English poet, born in Kent in 1618. He fought for the king in the civil war, and rose to the rank of captain. Having spent his fortune in the royal cause, he entered the French service in 1646. On his return to England in 1648, he was imprisoned for political reasons. In 1649 he was released, and published a volume of poems, consisting of odes, sonnets, etc., addressed to "Lucasta." Some of these are admired for grace and vigour. He died poor in 1658.

Lovell, lŭv'ĕl, (MANSFIELD,) an American general, born in Washington, District of Columbia, October 20, 1822, graduated at West Point in 1842. He lived in New York city when the civil war began. In October, 1861, he took command of the disunion army at New Orleans. After the Union fleet had passed the forts below the city, he evacuated New Orleans, which he transferred to the custody of the mayor on the 25th or 26th of April, 1862. Died in New York, June 1, 1884.

Lover, lŭv'ẹr, (SAMUEL,) an Irish novelist, poet, and painter, born in Dublin in 1797. He acquired in his youth a good reputation as a portrait-painter, and afterwards became a successful author. Besides numerous ballads and dramas, he produced "Legends and Stories of Ireland," and a novel entitled "Handy Andy," (1842,) and "Rory O'Moore," a song. Among his later publications is "Metrical Tales, and other Poems," (1859.) Died in July, 1868.

Lovering, lŭv'ẹr-ing, (JOSEPH,) born in Charlestown, Massachusetts, December 25, 1813, graduated at Harvard College in 1833, and in 1838 was made professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in that college. He published a great number of scientific memoirs, etc.

Lov'ĭ-bond, (EDWARD,) an English poet, was born in Middlesex, and inherited an easy fortune. He contributed several essays to "The World," a popular periodical, and was the author of various poems, among which "The Tears of Old May-Day" (1754) is highly praised. Died in 1775.

Lovini. See LUINI.

Lōw, (GEORGE,) a Scottish naturalist, born in Forfarshire in 1746. He became a clergyman in Pomona, one of the Orkney Isles, in 1774. He wrote "Fauna Orcadensis," (1813,) which treats of the animals of the Orkney and Shetland Isles. Died in 1795.

Lōw, (WILL HICOK,) an American artist, born at Albany, New York, May 31, 1853, studied in Europe, 1873–77, under C. Duran and J. L. Gérôme. He became a teacher of life and antique drawing in the National Academy, New York. Among his pictures are "Reverie," (1876,) a portrait of Emma Albani, (1877,) "Skipper Ireson," (1881,) "Arcades," (1882,) and "Telling the Bees," (1884.) He also attained distinction as a decorator and illustrator.

Lŏw'dẹr, (CHARLES FUGE,) an English clergyman, born at Bath, June 22, 1820. He was educated at King's College, London, and at Exeter College, Oxford, graduating in 1843. He was ordained a priest of the Established Church in 1844. His principal work was that of a missionary in the East of London, in which region he accomplished much good. He was an extreme ritualist. Died at Zell-am-See, Tyrol, September 9, 1880.

Löwe or Loewe, lö'v̂ẹh, the name of a German family, distinguished in various departments of art. AUGUST LEOPOLD LÖWE, born at Schwedt in 1767, was the composer of a popular opera entitled "The Island of Temptation." Died in 1816. His son FERDINAND, born in 1787, acquired a high reputation as a tragedian. Died in 1832. His daughter SOPHIE, born in 1815, became one of the most celebrated vocalists in Germany. She was married about 1840 to Prince Frederick of Liechtenstein. Died November 29, 1866. Her brother, FRANCIS LOUIS FEODOR, (born in 1816, died in 1890,) distinguished himself as an actor and a poet. JULIA LÖWE, aunt of the preceding, born in 1790, was very successful as an actress at Vienna. She died about 1850.

Lowe, lō, (Sir HUDSON,) a British general, born in Ireland about 1770. He served many campaigns in Egypt, Italy, Germany, etc., and obtained the rank of major-general in 1814. In 1815 he was selected to be the jailer of Bonaparte in Saint Helena. He was censured by many French and English writers for arbitrary, rude, and illiberal treatment of the captive, who in 1816 refused to see him or have any further intercourse with him. Died in 1844.

See a "History of the Captivity of Napoleon, from the Letters of Sir Hudson Lowe," etc., by W. FORSYTH, 4 vols., 1853.

Löwe, (JOHANN KARL GOTTFRIED,) a German composer, born near Halle in 1796. His works include operas, sonatas, ballads, and oratorios: of the last we may name "The Seven Sleepers." Died in 1869.

Lowe, (PETER,) a Scottish medical writer, practised medicine in Paris. He wrote a "Discourse on Chirurgery," and other works. Died in 1612.

Lowe, (ROBERT,) an English financier and eminent orator, born at Bingham in 1811. He graduated at Oxford in 1833, and practised as a barrister in Australia from 1843 to 1850. In 1852 he was returned to Parliament for Kidderminster. He was appointed vice-president of the education board in 1859, but was removed a few years later. He was a leader of the Adullamites, (nominal Liberals, who opposed the Reform Bill of Russell and Gladstone in 1866,) and was one of the ablest and most brilliant debaters in Parliament. He supported Gladstone's motion for the disestablishment of the Anglican Church in Ireland, and held the office of chancellor of the exchequer from 1868 to 1873, when he was appointed to the Home Office. He was created LL.D. of Edinburgh in 1867, and D.C.L. of Oxford in 1870. He was elected a member of Parliament for the University of London in November, 1868. In 1880 he received the title of Viscount Sherbrooke.

Lōw'ẹll, (CHARLES,) D.D., an American divine, a son of Judge Lowell, noticed below, was born at Boston in 1782. He became minister of the West Congregational Church in that city about 1806. He travelled extensively in Europe and the East, returning home in 1840. Among his publications are two volumes of sermons, (1855.) Died January 20, 1861.

Lowell, (Colonel CHARLES RUSSELL,) an American officer, born in Boston in 1835, was a nephew of the poet, J. R. Lowell. He graduated at Harvard in 1854 with the first honours. He served as captain of cavalry in the peninsular campaign in 1862, and commanded a body of cavalry which protected Washington in the summer of 1863, after which he served under General Sheridan and commanded a brigade. He had thirteen horses shot under him. He was killed at the battle of Cedar Creek, Virginia, October 19, 1864. He was a young man of great promise.

Lowell, (FRANCIS CABOT,) brother of John Lowell, (the second of the name,) born at Newburyport in 1775, was one of the principal founders of the city of Lowell, to which he gave his name. He was a merchant and manufacturer of cotton. Died in 1817.

Lowell, (JAMES RUSSELL,) a distinguished American poet, critic, and scholar, the son of the Rev. Charles Lowell, noticed above, was born February 22, 1819. Having graduated at Harvard in 1838, he entered the law school of that institution, where he remained two years, and was admitted to the bar in 1841; but he soon abandoned the profession, that he might devote himself wholly to literature. He published in 1844 a volume of poems containing a "Legend of Brittany," "Prometheus," and a number of smaller pieces. In 1848 appeared a second collection of poems, and in a small volume (separately) "The Vision of Sir Launfal." In the same year he also published the "Biglow Papers," a witty and humorous satire, written in the "Yankee" dialect, on the events of the Mexican war, and a "Fable for Critics," a charming jeu d'esprit, which, in the words of Professor Bowen, is "a very witty review article done into rhyme."* It is not too much to say that the best parts of this poem (which, by the way, is very unequal) are scarcely surpassed either in wit or in felicity of expression by anything of a similar kind in the English language. In the summer of 1851 Mr. Lowell visited Europe, and returned home after an absence of somewhat more than a year. In the winter of 1854–55 he delivered in Boston a very popular course of lectures on the British poets. Professor Longfellow having, in 1854, resigned the chair of the modern languages and belles-lettres at Harvard, Mr. Lowell was appointed his successor in January, 1855. On the establishment of the "Atlantic Monthly" in 1857, Professor Lowell became the editor,—a position which he held about five years,—and under his auspices this magazine acquired a wide and deserved popularity. Among his noteworthy poetical productions we may mention "Under the Willows, and other Poems," (1869,) and "The Cathedral," (1870.) Besides the various collections of his poems referred to above, he published several volumes of his prose writings, entitled "Among my Books," (1870; second series, 1876,) and "My Study Windows," (1871.)

* See "North American Review" for January, 1849.

Among the poets of America, Lowell is distinguished by the great range, as well as by the versatility, of his powers. He seems equally at home in the playful, the pathetic, or the meditative realms of poetry. And we always rise from the perusal of his productions with the impression that he has not put forth all his strength, but that something still higher would not have been beyond the reach of his genius. In 1877 he was appointed United States minister to Spain, and from 1879 until his removal by President Cleveland in 1885 he was minister to England. In 1883 he was chosen lord rector of St. Andrew's University, and while in England he received the degree of LL.D. from the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh. Died August 12, 1891.

See ALLIBONE, "Dictionary of Authors."

Lowell, (JOHN,) an American statesman, born at Newburyport, Massachusetts, in 1743. He began to practise law in Boston about 1777. As a member of the convention which formed the Constitution of Massachusetts in 1780, he efficiently promoted the liberation of slaves held in that State. He was elected a member of Congress in 1781, and appointed a judge of the district court of Massachusetts in 1789. He had three sons, John, Francis C., and Charles. Died at Roxbury in 1802.

Lowell, (JOHN,) an able lawyer and political writer, born at Newburyport in October, 1769, was a son of the preceding. He graduated at Harvard College in 1786, practised law at Boston, and acquired a high reputation. About 1803 he visited Europe. He was a Federalist, wrote much for the public journals, and exerted great influence in New England, but declined to enter the public service. He published twenty-five or more pamphlets, mostly political, and was one of the founders of the Boston Athenæum and the Massachusetts General Hospital. He was distinguished for his colloquial powers. Died at Boston in 1840.

Lowell, (JOHN,) the founder of Lowell Institute, was born in Boston, Massachusetts, in 1799, and was a son of Francis Cabot Lowell, noticed above. Having lost his wife and children about 1831, he travelled extensively in Europe, Syria, and Egypt. He died at Bombay in March, 1836, leaving by his will about $250,000 to maintain in Boston annual courses of gratuitous lectures on various subjects.

Lowell, (JOHN,) LL.D., an American jurist, born in Boston, October 18, 1824, graduated at Harvard College in 1843, was a United States district court judge, 1865–78, and a United States circuit court judge for Massachusetts, 1878–84. He published two volumes of United States Reports, and wrote especially upon bankruptcy.

Lowell, (MARIA WHITE,) an American poetess, the wife of James Russell Lowell, noticed above, was born at Watertown, Massachusetts, in 1821. She was married to Mr. Lowell in 1844. She died in 1853. She is described as having been singularly beautiful both in person and character. A volume of her poems appeared in 1855.

Lowell, (ROBERT TRAILL SPENCE,) son of the Rev. Charles Lowell, noticed above, was born in Boston in 1816. He was ordained a clergyman of the Episcopal Church in 1842, and subsequently became rector of Christ Church, Duanesburg, New York. He published a novel entitled "The New Priest in Conception Bay," and a collection of poems. Died September 12, 1891.

Löwen or Loewen, lö′ẘẹn, (JOHANN FRIEDRICH,) a German poet and writer of fiction, born at Klausthal in 1729; died in 1771.

Löwendahl or Loewendahl, lö′ẘẹn-dȧl′, written also Loevendahl, (ULRICH FRIEDRICH WOLDEMAR,) a celebrated general, born at Hamburg in 1700, was a great-grandson of Frederick III. of Denmark. He entered the service of Russia in the reign of Anne, about 1736, and as general of artillery gained victories over the Turks and Tartars. In 1743 he passed into the French service as lieutenant-general, and in 1745 commanded the reserve corps at Fontenoy. As second in command under Marshal Saxe, he took many towns in Flanders in the same year. For the capture of Bergen-op-Zoom, in 1747, he was rewarded with a marshal's bâton. He died in 1755.

Löwenhaupt or Loewenhaupt, lö′ẘẹn-hŏwpt′, (ADAM LOUIS,) COUNT, a skilful Swedish general, born in 1659. He was appointed Governor of Riga in 1706. On his march to join the army of Charles XII., who had invaded Russia, he was attacked by the Czar Peter at Liesna in 1708, and lost about 4000 men, but pursued his course. He displayed great courage at Pultowa, July, 1709, and when Charles fled to Turkey the command of the Swedish army devolved on Löwenhaupt, who was forced to capitulate in 1709. He was kept as a prisoner in Russia until his death, in 1719.

Löwenhaupt or Loewenhaupt, von, fon lö′ẘen-hŏwpt′, (CARL EMIL,) COUNT, a Swedish general, born in 1692. War having been declared against Russia, he was chosen general-in-chief of an army sent to invade Finland in 1742. His success was hindered by dissensions among the Swedish officers, and he surrendered at Helsingfors, in September, 1742. The anti-war party having become dominant, he was tried for that reverse, and executed in 1743.

Löwenhielm or Loewenhielm, lö′ẘẹn-he-ēlm′, (CARL GUSTAF,) COUNT OF, a Swedish statesman, was the chief of the party of "Caps." His party having gained the ascendency in 1765, he was then made minister of foreign affairs. He wrote several memoirs for the Academy of Sciences. Died in 1768.

Löwenhielm or Loewenhielm, (GUSTAF CARL FREDERIK,) COUNT OF, a Swedish diplomatist, born at Stockholm in 1771. He served in the army, and obtained the rank of general. He represented Sweden at the Congress of Vienna, (1814,) and was Swedish minister at the court of Paris from 1818 until 1856. He wrote several military treatises, and a remarkable work on the organization of government. Died in 1856.

Löwenklau. See LEUNCLAVIUS.

Löwenthal, lö′ẘẹn-tȧl, (JOHN JACOB,) a celebrated Hungarian chess-player and writer on the game, born in 1810, at Buda-Pesth. He went to London in 1851 to partake in a chess tournament, and from that time permanently resided in England. He published "Morphy's Games," "Book of the Chess Congress," (1864,) and "Transactions of the British Chess Association," (1867–69.) Died July 20, 1876.

Lower, lō′er, (MARK ANTHONY,) an English antiquarian writer, born at Chiddingly, Sussex, in 1813; died March 22, 1876.

Lŏw′er, (RICHARD,) F.R.S., an eminent English anatomist, born in Cornwall about 1630. He became a friend and coadjutor of Dr. Willis, whom he assisted in his work on the "Anatomy of the Brain." In 1661 he confirmed the Harveian theory by experiments on the transfusion of blood. He practised medicine in London many years, and wrote, besides other works, a "Treatise on the Heart, on the Motion of the Blood," etc. Died in 1691.

Lower, (Sir WILLIAM,) an English dramatist, born in Cornwall; died in 1662.

Lowitz, lo′ẘits, (GEORG MORITZ,) a German astronomer, born near Nuremberg in 1722. He became professor of mathematics at Göttingen about 1755, and was afterwards director of the observatory at that place. In 1766 he removed to Saint Petersburg, and was admitted into the Academy of Sciences, by which he was employed in astronomical observations. He was killed by some rebels at Dmetriefsk in 1774. He had written several memoirs on astronomy.

His son TOBIAS, born at Göttingen in 1757, became one of the most eminent members of the Imperial Academy of Saint Petersburg, and professor of chemistry. Died in 1804.

Low'man, (MOSES,) a learned English divine, born in London in 1680. About 1710 he settled at Clapham, where he preached many years to a congregation of Dissenters. He wrote a "Rationale of the Ritual of the Hebrew Worship," and other works. Died in 1752.

Lowndes, lŏwndz, (RAWLINS,) born in the British West Indies in 1722, settled at Charleston, South Carolina, where he rose to eminence as a statesman and lawyer. He was elected president or Governor of South Carolina in 1778. Died in 1800.

Lowndes, (WILLIAM JONES,) an eminent American statesman, a son of the preceding, was born at Charleston, South Carolina, on the 7th of February, 1782. He studied law, and married a daughter of General Thomas Pinckney. In 1810 or 1811 he was elected a member of Congress for a district of South Carolina. He was an eloquent debater, and was eminent for his wisdom and logical acumen. He is said to have been modest and unambitious. He continued to serve in Congress about eleven years, and was chairman of the committee of ways and means from 1818 to 1822. It appears that he was a general favourite, and was reputed to stand in the first rank of American statesmen. His health having failed, he sailed for Europe, but died on the voyage in October, 1822.

See "Encyclopædia Americana," (Supplement.)

Lowndes, (WILLIAM THOMAS,) an English bibliographer, lived in London. He published, about 1834, "The Bibliographer's Manual," which is highly esteemed. Died in 1843.

Lŏw'ry, (WILSON,) a skilful English engraver, born at Whitehaven in 1762, became a resident of London. He contributed to the perfection of his art by several important inventions, and acquired a high reputation, especially as an engraver of architecture and mechanism, in which he was unsurpassed. He engraved many figures for Rees's "Cyclopædia." Died in 1824.

Lowth, lŏwth, (ROBERT,) an English bishop and eminent writer, born at Winchester in 1710, was the son of William Lowth, noticed below. He was educated at Oxford, and became eminent as a biblical scholar. Having been chosen professor of poetry at Oxford, (1741,) he delivered "Lectures on the Poetry of the Hebrews," (in Latin,) which were published in 1753, and often reprinted. This work was highly esteemed by the most eminent critics. He was appointed Bishop of Saint David's in 1766, translated to the see of Oxford in the same year, and to that of London in 1777. Among his most important works is an excellent "Translation of the Prophet Isaiah," (1778.) Died in 1787.

See P. HALL, "Life of Bishop Lowth," 1834; "Memoirs of the Life of Robert Lowth," London, 1797; "Monthly Review" for February and March, 1779, and April, 1780.

Lowth, (WILLIAM,) a scholar and commentator, the father of Robert, noticed above, was born in London in 1661. He was chaplain to the Bishop of Winchester, and became rector of Buriton about 1700. He wrote several highly esteemed works, among which are "Directions for the Profitable Reading of the Holy Scriptures," (1708,) and a "Commentary on the Four Greater Prophets," (4 vols., 1714–26.) Died in 1732.

Lowther, (WILLIAM.) See LONSDALE, EARL OF.

Loyd, loid, (LEWIS,) an English banker, born in 1768. He was a partner of the banking-house of Jones, Loyd & Co., London, and was distinguished as a financier. He died in 1858. His son, Samuel J. Loyd, received the title of Lord Overstone.

Loyer, Le, lẹh lwâ'yà', (PIERRE,) a French lawyer, born in Anjou in 1550, was learned in antiquities and Oriental languages. He wrote a curious work on demonology, entitled "On Spectres, Angels, and Demons distinctly manifesting themselves to Men," ("Quatres Livres des Spectres, Anges et Démons se montrant sensiblement aux Hommes,") and other works. Died in 1634.

Loyola, loi-o'la, [Sp. pron. lo-yo'lâ,] (IGNATIUS,) originally Don IÑIGO LOPEZ de Recalde, (dà rà-kâl'dà,) often called Saint Ignatius, (ig-nā'she-us;) [Fr. SAINT-IGNACE, sân'tẽn'yâs'; It. SANT' IGNAZIO, sânt ẽn-yât'-se-o,] a celebrated Spanish reformer, and the founder of the order of Jesuits, was born of a noble family at Loyola Castle, in Biscay, in 1491. He received from nature an ardent, imaginative temperament, and in youth was the very prototype of the hero of Cervantes, an enthusiastic votary of chivalrous romance. After signalizing his gallantry in several campaigns, he received about 1520, at the siege of Pampeluna, a wound which made him a cripple for life. During the tedious confinement which followed, his attention was directed to the mysteries of religion. Ascribing his recovery to a miracle of grace, he dedicated himself to arduous religious enterprises and to the service of the Blessed Virgin. He became a popular preacher, and was renowned for his penances and vigils. In 1523 he performed a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, from which he returned to Spain in 1524. He passed several ensuing years at Alcalá and Salamanca in the study of grammar, philosophy, etc., which he had neglected to learn in his youth. In 1528 he became a student in the University of Paris, where he found several congenial spirits, among whom were Francis Xavier and James Lainez. With these he formed in 1534 a religious society devoted to the education of youth, the renovation of the Catholic Church, and the conversion of the infidels.

After they had digested the polity and peculiar maxims of the new order, Paul III. gave it his formal sanction in 1540, and Loyola was chosen superior or general (with absolute power) of the order, which was styled the Society of Jesus. Loyola thenceforth remained in Rome, and witnessed the extraordinary success of his efforts. "Under his rule," says Macaulay, "the order grew rapidly to the full measure of its gigantic powers. With what vehemence, with what policy, with what exact discipline, with what dauntless courage, with what self-denial, with what unscrupulous laxity and versatility in the choice of means, the Jesuits fought the battles of their Church, is written in every page of the annals of Europe during several generations. In the Order of Jesus was concentrated the quintessence of the Catholic spirit; and the history of the Order of Jesus is the history of the great Catholic reaction. This order possessed itself at once of all the strongholds which command the public mind,—of the pulpit, of the press, of the confessional, of the academies. . . . Nor was it less their office to plot against the thrones and lives of apostate kings, to spread evil rumours, to raise tumults, to inflame civil wars, to arm the hand of the assassin." (See Review of Ranke's "History of the Popes.") It does not appear, however, that Loyola was responsible for the corruptions referred to in the above quotation. His chief work is "Spiritual Exercises," ("Exercicios espirituales," 1548,) in which he gives rules and counsels for the guidance of believers. He died in 1556, and was canonized as a saint by the pope in 1622.

Lu'cạn, (GEORGE CHARLES BINGHAM,) EARL OF, a British general, a son of the Earl of Lucan, was born in London in 1800. He succeeded to the earldom about 1840. In 1854–55 he served in the Crimea in command of a division of cavalry, and took part in the battles of the Alma, Balaklava, and Inkerman. He became colonel in the Life-Guards in 1855, and was made lieutenant-general in 1858, and general in 1865. Died in 1888.

Lu'cạn, [Lat. LUCA'NUS; Fr. LUCAIN, lü'kȧn'; It. LUCANO, loo-kȧ'no,] (MARCUS ANNÆUS,) a Roman epic poet, born at Corduba, (Córdova,) Spain, in 38 A.D., was a nephew of the philosopher Seneca. He was educated at Rome. His early poems procured him the favour of Nero, who appointed him quæstor and augur and condescended to appear as his rival in a literary contest. Lucan gained the prize, but at the same time lost the favour of the tyrant, whom he had formerly addressed with gross adulation. Nero forbade him to read any more poems in public. Lucan, with Piso and others, conspired against the life of Nero; the plot was detected, and the poet was put to death in 65 A.D. His fame rests on a poem entitled "Pharsalia," which treats of the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey, and displays great beauties with great defects. Among the latter is an inflated, declamatory style. Corneille and Voltaire were warm admirers of Lucan. "His genius," says Villemain, referring to his early death, "had only time to produce grandeur, without naturalness or truth." Among his merits are exalted imagination, intense energy, and impressive diction.

Lucian, loo'she-an, [Gr. Λουκιανός; Lat. LUCIA'NUS; Fr. LUCIEN, lü'se-ăN'; It. LUCIANO, loo-chā'no,] one of the most witty and original Greek writers, was born at Samosata, (Someisat,) on the Euphrates, about 120 A.D. He practised law a short time at Antioch, and exchanged that profession for the more lucrative pursuit of sophist and teacher of rhetoric, which he followed with success in Gaul until he was about forty years old. Again changing his profession, he returned to the East, and lived many years at Athens, where he was intimate with Demonax and employed his time in literary composition. His principal works are dialogues, written in pure and elegant Greek, on history, mythology, philosophy, and various other subjects. His object appears to have been to cure men of their prejudices and superstitions and their foolish admiration of philosophic charlatans. His genius is eminently satirical, and his works are remarkably humorous; but some of them are censured as offensive to morality and religion. Among the titles of his dialogues are "Timon the Misanthrope," "Charon," "Menippus," and "The Assembly of Gods." English versions of his dialogues have been published by T. Franklin (1780) and William Tooke, (1820.) Wieland produced a good German translation. Good editions of the Greek text have been published by Dindorf (Paris, 1840) and Bekker, (1853.)

Lucian, [Fr. LUCIEN, lü'se'ăN',] SAINT, a Christian martyr, born at Samosata in the third century, was eminent for piety and learning. He was ordained a priest or presbyter at Antioch. He prepared a revised edition of the Scriptures, which, Jerome says, was more correct than those of Hesychius and Pamphilus. Diocletian having issued an edict against the Christians, Lucian suffered martyrdom in 312 A.D.

Lu'cĭ-fer, Bishop of Calaris, (now Cagliari,) in Sardinia, was noted for his intolerance and zeal against Arianism. About 355 A.D. he was banished by Constantius, who favoured the Arians. He wrote a "Defence of Athanasius," and other works. He refused to recognize as orthodox those bishops who signed the formula of Rimini, (359,) or to have fellowship with any who recognized them, and finally became the author of a schism. He had many followers, who formed a distinct sect, called Luciferians. Died about 370 A.D.

Lu-cil'ĭ-us, (CAIUS,) a Roman satiric poet, born at Suessa Aurunca, (now Sessa,) in Italy, about 148 B.C., was a great-uncle of Pompey the Great. In early youth he served under Scipio Africanus at the siege of Numantia, and became an intimate friend of that general. He composed thirty satires and various other poems; but only fragments of his works have come down to us. Horace asserts that he was the first writer of satire among the Romans, (Sat., lib. 2, i. 62.) His satires were much admired by many ancient critics, including Cicero, Quintilian, and Pliny. "He was," says Professor Sellar, "vehement in invective, because he was thoroughly earnest in his purpose to expose vice and baseness among the high and low with impartial severity. Although probably few writers of verse have had less poetical faculty, yet, by his originality and force of character, he became the favourite of his own time and country; and he alone among Roman writers has introduced a new and permanent form of poetry into the world." Died about 100 B.C.

Lucil'ius Ju'nior, a Roman poet and naturalist, lived in the first century, and was a friend of Seneca. He is supposed to be the author of a poem of six hundred and forty hexameter verses, entitled "Ætna," which presents some fine passages.

Lu-cī'na, [Fr. LUCINE, lü'sĕn',] the name of the goddess that brings to light and presides over the birth of children, was used as a surname of Juno and of Diana, both of whom were supposed to assist women in parturition, and were sometimes called LUCINÆ. The Greek goddess ILITHYI'A or EILEITHYIA ['Ειλείθυια] appears to be essentially the same as Diana (Artemis) in her character of Lucina.

Lucius, loo'she-us, [Fr. LUCE, lüss,] I., Bishop of Rome, succeeded Cornelius in October, 252 A.D., and died in March, 253. Stephen I. was his successor.

Lucius II., a native of Bologna, was elected pope in March, 1144, as successor to Celestine II. He died in 1145, after a pontificate of eleven months, and Eugenius III. was chosen in his place.

Lucius III. (Cardinal UBALDO OF LUCCA) was elected pope in 1181, after the death of Alexander III. His election was the first that was decided by the cardinals, the clergy and people being excluded from the right to vote. A revolt of the people of Rome obliged him to leave the city, and he retired to Verona. He died in 1185, and was succeeded by Urban III.

Lucius, (CÆSAR,) a Roman prince, born 17 B.C., was a son of M. Agrippa and Julia, who was a daughter of the emperor Augustus. He and his brother Caius were heirs-presumptive of the empire, but they died before Augustus. Lucius died in 2 A.D. The Maison Carrée at Nîmes was a temple dedicated to Caius and Lucius.

Lucius, lu'she-us, [It. LUCIO, loo'cho,] (GIOVANNI,) a historian, born at Trau, in Dalmatia. He published in 1666 a "History of Dalmatia and Croatia." Died in 1684.

Lücke or Luecke, lük'kẹh, (GOTTFRIED CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH,) an eminent German theologian, was born at Egeln, near Magdeburg, in 1791. He studied at Halle in 1810, and subsequently at Göttingen, where he formed a friendship with Bunsen and Lachmann. He became professor of theology at Bonn in 1818, and soon after published, conjointly with Schleiermacher and De Wette, the "Theological Journal." His "Commentary on the Writings of Saint John the Evangelist" (4 vols., 1820–32) is esteemed one of the best works of its kind. In 1827 he succeeded Stäudlin in the chair of theology at Göttingen. Died at Göttingen in 1855.

Luckner, lo͝ok'nẹr, (NIKOLAUS,) a marshal of France, born at Kampen, in Bavaria, in 1722. At an early age he entered the service of Prussia, for which he fought with distinction in the Seven Years' war, (1756–63.) About 1763 he accepted the rank of lieutenant-general in the French army, which for many subsequent years was not called into active service. Having submitted to the new régime, he was promoted to the rank of marshal in December, 1791. In the spring of 1792 he obtained command of one of the armies which defended the frontier against the Austrians, and a few weeks later succeeded Rochambeau as general-in-chief. The dominant party, distrusting both his fidelity and capacity, deprived him of the command in 1792. He was guillotined in January, 1794.

Lucrèce. See LUCRETIA and LUCRETIUS.

Lucretia, loo-kree'she-a, [It. LUCREZIA, loo-krĕt'se-â; Fr. LUCRÈCE, lü'krȧs',] a Roman lady, distinguished for her beauty, virtue, and tragical destiny, was the wife of Collatinus, who was related to Tarquin the Proud, King of Rome. The outrage offered to her honour by Sextus Tarquin, and the voluntary sacrifice of her life, (507 B.C.,) have furnished a favourite theme for poets and painters, and, according to a doubtful legend, caused the dethronement of Tarquin, and the conversion of the Roman state into a republic, under the direction of Junius Brutus.

Lucretius, lu-kree'she-us, [Fr. LUCRÈCE, lü'krȧss'; It. LUCREZIO, loo-krĕt'se-o; Sp. LUCRECIO, loo-krā'the-o,] or, to give his full name, Ti'tus Lucre'tius Ca'rus, one of the greatest Latin poets, was born in Italy in 95 B.C., and was contemporary with Cicero. The records of antiquity throw scarcely any light on his life, which was probably passed in studious retirement. It is not known whether he ever visited Greece; but it is evident from his writings that he had profoundly studied the language, philosophy, and manners of that people. A doubtful tradition asserts that he was subject to insanity caused by a love-potion; and the statement that he committed suicide in his forty-fourth year is generally credited. He left only one work,—a philosophic and didactic poem, in six books, entitled "De Rerum Naturâ," ("On the Nature of Things,") in which he expounds and illustrates the physical and ethical doctrines of Epicurus, of whom he was a disciple. From such abstruse speculations and intractable subjects he has produced one of the most admirable poems in the language. Although his system is erroneous and incoherent, his reasoning is remarkably clear and close. Probably no other work so amply demonstrates the power of the Latin language to utter the sublimest conceptions with a sustained majesty and harmony. "A great atheistic poet," says Villemain, "is surely a surprising phenomenon. His genius finds sublime accents to attack all the inspirations of genius. He renders even nothingness poetic; he insults glory; he enjoys death. Out of the abyss of skepticism he sometimes soars to a height of enthusiasm which is rivalled only by the sublimity of Homer." Referring to this work, Macaulay remarks, "The finest poem in the Latin language—indeed, the finest didactic poem in any language—was written in defence of the silliest and meanest of all systems of natural and moral philosophy." Ovid appears to be the only contemporary writer who fully appreciated the genius of Lucretius.

Lu-cul'lus, (Lucius Licinius,) a celebrated Roman general, born of a patrician family about 110 B.C. In the year 87 he went to Asia as quæstor under Sulla, who gave him many proofs of his confidence. After an absence of several years, during which the civil war between Marius and Sulla raged at Rome, he returned, and was elected consul in 74 B.C. In this year he obtained the chief command in the war against Mithridates, whom he defeated at Cyzicus in 73, and, after other victories, drove him out of the kingdom of Pontus. He afterwards defeated Tigranes of Armenia, whose capital he took about 68 B.C. The mutiny of his troops prevented his final triumph over Mithridates, and he was superseded by Pompey in the year 66. Cicero expressed the opinion that so great a war was never conducted with more prudence and courage. ("Pro Muræna.") Lucullus then retired from public affairs, and expended part of the immense fortune he had acquired in the East in building magnificent villas, giving sumptuous entertainments, and collecting expensive paintings and statues. He was a liberal patron of learning and the arts. Sulla had dedicated to him his Commentaries. Plutarch, after comparing him with Cimon, says it is hard to say to which side the balance inclines. He was living in 59, but was not living in 56 B.C.

Ludeke, loo'dẹh-kẹh, or Ludecke, loo'dêk-kẹh, (Christoph Wilhelm,) a German writer, born at Schönberg in 1737, was minister of a German church in Stockholm. He published a "Historical Account of Turkey." Died in 1805.

Luden, loo'dẹn, (Heinrich,) a distinguished German historical and political writer, born in the duchy of Bremen in 1780. He became in 1810 professor of philosophy at Jena, where he also lectured on history. His most important work is a "History of the German Nation," ("Die Geschichte des Deutschen Volkes," 12 vols., 1825–37,) brought down to 1237. He also wrote general histories of the nations of antiquity and of the middle ages, a "Life of Hugo Grotius," (1806,) several biographies, etc. Died at Jena in 1847.

Luden, (Heinrich,) a son of the preceding, was born at Jena in 1810. He became a professor of law, and a member of the court of cassation at Jena. He published several legal works. Died December 24, 1880.

Lüders, lü'dẹrs, (Alexander Nikolaievitch,) a Russian general, of German origin, born in 1790. He defeated the Hungarians under Bem in July, 1849, and succeeded Gortchakof in the command of the army of the Danube in 1855. He was commander-in-chief in the Crimea for a few weeks between the fall of Sebastopol and the end of the war. Died February 13, 1874.

Lŭd'lōw, (Edmund,) an able English republican general, born in Wiltshire about 1620. He fought against the king at Edgehill in 1642, and led a regiment at the battle of Newbury. Elected to Parliament in 1645, he voted for the conversion of the kingdom into a republic, and was one of the judges who condemned Charles I. in 1649. In this year he was chosen a member of the council of state, in which he opposed the ambitious designs of Cromwell. In 1650 he went to Ireland as lieutenant-general. On the death of Ireton, November, 1651, the command of the army devolved on Ludlow. As he refused to support the government of the Protector, (1653,) he was deprived of command. After the death of Oliver (1658) he resumed his seat in Parliament, and obtained command of the army in Ireland in 1659. At the restoration (1660) he escaped through France to Vevay, where he resided mostly until his death, in 1693. He left Memoirs of his life, (2 vols., 1698.) Macaulay refers to him as "almost the only survivor, [in 1689,] certainly the most illustrious survivor, of a mighty race of men, the judges of a king, the founders of a republic. . . . There was but a single blemish on his fame,"—i.e. the execution of Charles I.

Luiken, loi'kẹn, (JAN,) a Dutch engraver, born in 1649; died in 1708. He published in 1671 a noteworthy volume of poems.

Luini, loo-ee'nee, (AURELIO,) an Italian painter, a son of Bernardino, noticed below, was born about 1530. He worked at Milan, and painted scriptural subjects, among which is "The Adoration of the Magi." He died, according to Lanzi, in 1593; but some date his death many years earlier.

See LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy."

Luini, Luvini, loo-vee'nee, or Lovini, lo-vee'nee, (BERNARDINO,) an eminent Italian painter, was born at Luino, on Lake Maggiore. He is called the most excellent imitator and pupil of Leonardo da Vinci. Lomazzo says he was already a distinguished painter in 1500. Luini worked both in fresco and oil, and painted at Milan several works which are still in good preservation. "Few painters," says Lanzi, "deserve to be compared to him." Among his master-pieces in oil are a "Magdalene," a "Madonna," and a "Saint John with a Lamb," all at Milan. He excelled in colouring, chiaroscuro, and the expression of feminine grace. He died after 1530. His sons, AURELIO and EVANGELISTA, were skilful painters.

See VASARI, "Lives of the Painters," etc.; LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy."

Luini, (EVANGELISTA,) a decorative painter of Milan, was a son of the preceding. Died after 1584.

Luitprand, loo'it-prand or lūt'prand, written also Liutprand, King of the Lombards, the son of Ansprand, reigned from 712 A.D. until 744. His valour and wisdom are praised by Sismondi. In 739 he marched into France to aid Charles Martel against the Saracens. He died in 744, and was succeeded by his nephew Hildebrand.

See MURATORI, "Annali d'Italia."

Luitprand or Liutprand, [Lat. LUITPRAN'DUS,] a historical writer, was one of the most learned men of the age. He was sent as ambassador to Constantinople in 946 by Berenger, Marquis of Ivrea. Having been chosen Bishop of Cremona, he attended in 963 a council (at Rome) which deposed Pope John. In 968 the emperor Otho I. sent him on a mission to Constantinople, where he was maltreated by the emperor. He was author of an esteemed "History of Europe from 862 to 964."

Luke, [Gr. Λουκᾶς; Lat. LU'CAS; Fr. LUC, lük; It. LUCA, loo'kä,] SAINT, one of the Four Evangelists, was a companion of the Apostle Paul in his mission to the Gentiles, between 50 and 66 A.D. The time and place of his birth are unknown. That he was liberally educated is made evident by the classical style of his writings and by the learned details which he gives on historical and geographical subjects. His Gospel contains valuable accounts which are not found in the others. He also wrote "The Acts of the Apostles," which, as well as his Gospel, is in the Greek language. Tradition indicates that Saint Luke is the same as the physician Luke mentioned by Saint Paul in Colossians iv. 14, and the same as Lucas named in Philemon 24. (See II. Timothy iv. 11.)

Lulli or Lulle, lool'lee, [Fr. LULLE, lül,] (ANTONIO,) a grammarian, born in Majorca. He corresponded with Erasmus, and wrote a treatise on rhetoric, called "De Oratione." Died in 1582.

Lulli or Lully, lü'le', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a celebrated Italian composer, called "the father of French dramatic music," was born at Florence in 1633. About the age of fourteen he went to Paris, where he became a skilful performer on the violin, and was patronized by Louis XIV. In the fêtes which were often repeated at court, he found occasion to try his talents for operatic music. In 1672 the king gave him the privilége or direction of the Royal Academy of Music, from which time dates the foundation of the Grand Opera in France. Co-operating with Quinault the poet, Lulli composed in fifteen years nineteen operas, which were very successful. He finally became one of the secretaries of the king. Died in 1687.

Lulli, written also Lully, Lulle, and Lull, [Lat. LUL'LUS or LUL'LIUS,] (RAYMOND,) a philosopher, surnamed THE ENLIGHTENED DOCTOR, was born at Palma, in Majorca, about 1235. He professed to believe that he was called to convert the Moslems, and he prepared himself for the task by learning Arabic. In order to prove that the mysteries of faith were not opposed to reason, he composed a treatise, or method, called "Ars Lulli," or "Ars Magna Lulli," ("The Great Art of Lulli,") designed also to systematize knowledge and facilitate the process of reasoning on all questions. His method obtained great celebrity; but, according to Hallam, it was an "idle and fraudulent attempt to substitute trick for science." "He was one of those innovators in philosophy who, by much boasting of their original discoveries in the secrets of truth, gain credit for systems of science which those who believe in them seldom trouble themselves to examine." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") But Hallam's judgment is much too severe. Lulli was full of quixotic and fantastical projects, of which his "Great Art" was one, but he was honest and generous, and in many ways far in advance of his times. He wrote many treatises and tractates in Latin and in the Catalan tongue. He made several attempts to convert the Moors in Northern Africa, and was violently persecuted by them. He died in consequence of injuries received from the Moslems in 1315.

Lu'ther, (MARTIN,) [Ger. pron. mar'tin loo'tẹr; Lat. MARTI'NUS LUTHE'RUS; It. MARTINO LUTERO, mar-tee'no loo-tā'ro; Sp. MARTIN LUTERO, mar-tẽn' loo-tā'ro,] the great leader of the Reformation in Germany, was born at Eisleben, the 10th of November, 1483. He was the son of Hans Luther, a miner. His mother's maiden name was Margarethe Lindemann. At the age of fifteen he was sent to the Latin school at Eisenach, then under the direction of Trebonius. In 1501 he entered the university at Erfurt. While here, he found in the university library a rare and precious book,—a Latin Bible,—which became an object of extraordinary interest to him. About this time a severe attack of illness, and, soon after, the sudden death of one of his intimate friends, (caused, as some historians state, by a stroke of lightning,) produced such an impression on the mind of young Luther, that he made a solemn vow to become a monk, and in July, 1505, he entered the Augustine convent at Erfurt. In 1507 he was ordained a priest, and in the following year, through the influence of Staupitz, (the provincial of his order, and subsequently vicar-general,) he was appointed professor of philosophy in the University of Wittenberg. Luther's visit to Rome, made in 1510, in fulfilment of a previous vow, opened to him new views of the character and condition of the Romish Church. In 1512 he was made licentiate and doctor of divinity, and began about this time to declare openly his views of scriptural theology, which he explained according to the system of Saint Augustine, resting the doctrine of justification solely on faith in the sacrifice of the Saviour. In 1517, Tetzel, a Dominican monk, received from the pope, (Leo X.,) through the Archbishop of Magdeburg, a commission for the sale of indulgences. With a view to increase the demand for his merchandise, Tetzel asserted, what few or none of the other Catholics appear to have ever claimed, that the indulgences not only released the purchasers from the necessity of penance, but absolved them from all the consequences of sin both here and hereafter. Indignant at what he regarded as an insult to reason and religion, Luther drew up his celebrated ninety-five propositions, in which he set forth in the strongest language the theological unsoundness as well as the pernicious effects of Tetzel's doctrine of indulgences. This publication involved Luther in violent controversies. Among the most conspicuous of his opponents was Dr. Eck, (in Latin, Eckius or Eccius,) professor of divinity at Ingolstadt. But the cause of the Reformer steadily gained ground, and among the number of his favourers was Frederick the Wise, the Elector of Saxony,—one of the most powerful princes of Germany. Leo having summoned Luther to plead his cause at Rome, the Elector interposed, and it was arranged that the examination or trial should take place at Augsburg, before Cardinal Cajetan, (Caietano,) the legate of the pope. The cardinal having refused to enter into any discussion with Luther, at the same time insisting that the latter should submit himself unreservedly to the authority of the papal see, Luther, fearing—perhaps with too much reason—the fate of John Huss, secretly withdrew from Augsburg, leaving an "appeal to the pope when he should be better informed." Soon after Leo issued a bull in support of the doctrine of indulgences; whereupon Luther appealed from the pope to a general council of the Church.

With a view to restore tranquillity to the Church, Leo sent his chamberlain Miltitz—a Saxon by birth, and a man of great tact and intelligence—as nuncio into Germany. By kindness and flattery, Miltitz obtained from Luther (March, 1519) a promise that he would submit to the authority of the pope and discontinue the controversy respecting indulgences, on condition that his adversaries should also preserve silence on the subject. Dr. Eck, however, would not permit the controversy to slumber. He soon after challenged Carlstadt, one of Luther's disciples, to a public dispute at Leipsic; so that Luther himself was again almost unavoidably involved in the contest. The result was a confirmation of his former views of the fallibility of the pope and the errors of the Church, which found expression in several publications, and especially in a work entitled "De Captivitate Babylonicâ Ecclesiæ," ("On the Babylonian Captivity of the Church.") Leo had, a short time previously to this publication, issued a bull condemning forty-one propositions which had been selected from the works of Luther, and directing the bishops to search diligently for the writings in which those errors were contained, and to have them publicly burned. Luther resolved to anticipate the blow, and at the same time to render the breach between himself and Rome forever impassable. Attended by a crowd of doctors, professors, and students, he proceeded to a spot fixed on for the purpose, without the walls of Wittenberg, near the east gate, and there burned before the assembled multitude the bull, with the accompanying decretals and canons relating to the pope's supreme authority.

Up to this period, it would appear that the reverence for the Church in which Luther had been educated had always exercised a controlling influence upon his mind; for, although he denounced in the boldest manner the abuses of the ecclesiastical power, he had ever manifested a profound respect for the sovereign pontiff himself. But now he broke through all restraint, and not only denied the authority of the pope, but he assailed him with all the fierce invective and vituperation which were so common in that age.

After this additional provocation, it was not to be expected that the thunders of the Church should slumber. Not content with merely excommunicating Luther and laying every place which should harbour him under an interdict, Leo urged the newly-elected emperor, Charles V., to come forward as the champion of Catholicism and inflict upon the arch-heretic and his adherents the punishment due to their apostasy. But the Elector of Saxony, to whom Charles had been indebted for his new dignity, interposed a second time, and so far prevailed that it was determined the cause of Luther should be tried before the Diet of the empire. The Diet assembled at Worms early in the year 1521. It was the wish and intention of the legate Aleander and the other advocates of the papal cause that Luther should not be present at his own trial. But the majority of the Diet, whether influenced by friendship for the Reformer or by the desire to preserve the appearance of justice in their proceedings, insisted that Luther should not be condemned unheard. The emperor was prevailed upon to grant him a safe-conduct, (dated March 6, 1521.) The greater number of Luther's friends earnestly dissuaded him from going to Worms. Even Spalatin, the secretary and confidential adviser of the Elector Frederick, sent him a pressing message exhorting him on no account to enter that city. Luther replied, "Were there as many devils in Worms as tiles upon the roofs of the houses, still would I enter," ("Wenn so viel Teufel zu Worms wären als Ziegel auf den Dächern, doch wollt' ich hinein.") He arrived in the city on the 16th of April, and appeared before the Diet the following day. When asked if he was the author of the works produced against him, containing the passages which had been condemned, he replied in the affirmative. On being again asked whether he was prepared to retract the objectionable doctrines contained in them, he answered that, as this question concerned the word of God, the Christian faith, and the salvation of souls, it was of great importance that he should not speak rashly, lest he should offend against the word of God: he therefore desired that time might be allowed him for consideration. The next day he was again brought before the Diet. While he admitted that in some instances he might have written with less humility and more violence than became his ecclesiastical character, he refused to retract anything that he had said, unless it could be shown to be contrary to the Scriptures; at the same time, he boldly repeated and defended several of his positions which had been objected to. Hereupon Charles and the other favourers of the Catholic cause refused to hear him any further. He was commanded to leave Worms. He accordingly returned to Saxony. As he was journeying on the borders of the Thuringian Forest, he was suddenly seized by a number of warriors in masks, and hurried off to the solitary castle of Wartburg, where his ecclesiastical habit was exchanged for the dress and sword of a knight. This whole proceeding was a stratagem of Frederick to protect the Reformer against the designs of his enemies. Luther had previously been apprised of the scheme. He remarks, in one of his letters, that he scarcely knew himself in his strange disguise.

Immediately after the departure of Luther, Aleander, the Papal legate, prevailed on Charles to give the edict against him the sanction of the imperial signature and seal. It was declared, in the name of the emperor, that, as soon as the term of his safe-conduct had expired, Luther should be seized and held in durance until they should be informed how to deal with him.

Luther remained in the castle of Wartburg about ten months. He left it in March, 1522, and returned to Wittenberg in order to rebuke the excesses into which some of his former disciples had fallen. In 1524 he laid aside the monastic dress; and in 1525 he married Catharina von Bora, who had once been a nun. Luther completed his German version of the Old Testament in 1534; his translation of the New Testament had appeared in 1522. These translations, by their extensive circulation, as well as by the force and beauty of the language, have exerted a most important influence upon German literature, which may almost be said to date its origin from their composition.

Frederick the Wise, Luther's faithful friend and protector, died in 1525, and was succeeded by his nephew John, who was an open and devoted adherent of the great Reformer. During the latter portion of his life, Luther was held in the highest consideration by most of the princes of Germany, where his doctrines continued to spread, and finally, even during his lifetime, extended to Moravia, Bohemia, Denmark, and Sweden. He died at Eisleben, the 18th of February, 1546, in the sixty-third year of his age. Among Luther's voluminous works, his translation of the Bible, already mentioned, is the most important. Besides his controversial writings, he has left numerous letters, sermons, etc. His "Table-Talk," ("Tischreden,") which is, says Carlyle, "the most interesting now of all the books proceeding from him," consists of sayings and anecdotes collected by Luther's friends after his death.

Although the character of Luther was especially distinguished by ardent zeal and unconquerable courage, yet on important occasions he could exercise the greatest moderation as well as discretion. The intrepidity with which he faced the dangers that threatened him at Worms is not more deserving of our praise than the admirable prudence and tact which he displayed in his defence on that memorable occasion. The fierce invective and coarse vituperation for which his controversial writings have been censured, are palliated by the consideration that such was the almost universal custom of that age. If his opposition was violent, it was not malignant or unforgiving. When his bitterest enemy, Tetzel,—the man who had excited Luther's fiercest indignation,—was in misfortune and disgrace, forsaken by all his friends, he received from his generous adversary a letter of condolence and consolation. As a reformer, Luther sought to introduce such changes only as he deemed to be imperatively demanded; and to the last he clung to some of the doctrines of his early faith which were rejected by all or nearly all the other Protestants. He was always an advocate of peace where peace could be had without the sacrifice of any great principle; and, so long as he lived, he steadfastly opposed, both by his counsels and by his influence, those religious contests which after his death desolated Germany.

"Justification by Faith" formed the great central doctrine in Luther's system of theology, as unconditional election and reprobation was the central idea of that of Calvin. The great aim of the latter would seem to have been to prove the utter and absolute helplessness of man; and, in the march of his inexorable logic, he sometimes appears equally regardless of the hopes of mankind and of the justice of God. Luther, while ascribing everything in the act of conversion to the grace of God, seems not so completely to close the door to human aspirations,—taking for his motto, "If thou canst believe —all things are possible to him that believeth."

Luther is described as a man of low stature but handsome person, with a lively complexion and falcon eyes. His voice was clear and of great power. On beholding his picture, Melanchthon is said to have exclaimed, "Each one of thy words was a thunderbolt!" ("Fulmina erant singula verba tua.") Carlyle says of him, "No more valiant man ever lived in that Teutonic kindred whose character is valour: the thing he will quail before exists not on this earth or under it." "He was," observes Heine, "not only the greatest, but the most German, man of our history. In his character all the faults and all the virtues of the Germans are combined on the largest scale. He had qualities which are very seldom found united, which we are accustomed to regard as irreconcilable antagonisms. . . . He was not only the tongue, but the sword, of his time. Sometimes he was wild as the storm that uproots the oak, and again he was as gentle as the zephyr which dallies with the violet." In a not dissimilar strain, Carlyle contrasts the wild, unconquerable energy with the affectionate tenderness of Luther's character: "A most gentle heart withal, full of pity and love, as, indeed, the truly valiant heart ever is." Alluding to Luther's fondness for music, he adds, "Death-defiance on the one hand, and such love of music on the other,—between these two, all great things had room."

Those who may desire to see a less favourable view of the great Reformer's character and influence, are referred to the article "Luther" in the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale," from the pen of the editor, Dr. Hoefer.

In 1821 he was commissioned to explore Kamschatka, in 1822–24 he made several voyages in the Arctic regions, and in 1826–28 he commanded an exploring expedition round the world, in which he was accompanied by a scientific staff. He was made an admiral in 1856, and a count in 1866. Died in August, 1882.

Luton, lü'tôN', (Louis,) a French chemist and painter on glass, born in Paris in 1757; died in 1852.

Luttrell, Colonel. See Wilkes, (John.)

Lut'trĕll, (Henry,) an English poet, wit, and man of fashion, born in 1770. He is said to have been a natural son of Lord Carhampton. He published "Advice to Julia, a Letter in Rhyme," (1820,) and "Crockford House," (1827,) but was best known as a brilliant talker in London society. Died in 1851.

Lut'trĕll, (Narcissus,) an English political writer, who kept a diary of public events during the Revolution of 1688 and subsequent years, which Macaulay often quotes and calls a valuable manuscript. Died about 1732. His diary was published in 1857.

See "North British Review" for November, 1857.

Lutz, loots, (Wilhelm Meyer,) a German musician and composer, born at Männerstadt, Kissingen, in 1829. In 1848 he went to England, where he has since resided. He has produced many operas and operettas, chief among which are "Faust and Marguerite," (1855,) "Zaida," (1868,) "Legend of the Lys," (1873,) etc.

Lützelburger or Luetzelburger, lüt'sĕl-bûrG'ẹr, sometimes erroneously written Leutzelburger, (Hans,) also called Hans Frank, a Swiss wood-engraver, of whom very little is known, lived about 1520–40. Among the most important works attributed to him is the "Dance of Death," (usually ascribed to Holbein,) "Illustrations of the Old Testament," a portrait of Erasmus, and "The Sale of Indulgences."

See Nagler, "Allgemeines Künstler-Lexikon."

Lützow or Luetzow, lüt'so, (Ludwig Adolf Wilhelm,) a Prussian general, born in 1782. In 1813 he commanded a free corps of "black chasseurs" against the French. Died at Berlin, December 6, 1834.

Lützow, von, fon lüt'so, (THERESA VON STRUVE,) MADAME, a German authoress, born at Stuttgart in 1804. She wrote several novels and books of travel. Died in Java in 1852.

Luvigini, loo-ve-jee'nee, Luisini, loo-e-šee'nee, or Luisino, loo·e·šee'no, [Lat. LUISI'NUS,] (FRANCESCO,) an Italian scholar, born at Udine in 1523. He was preceptor of the son of Ottavio Farnese, Duke of Parma. Among his works is a "Latin Commentary on Horace's Art of Poetry," (1554.) His poetical talent is praised by Muret and Giraldi. Died in 1568.

Luvigini or Luisino, (LUIGI,) a brother of the preceding, born at Udine, was a physician at Venice. Among his works is a version of the "Aphorisms" of Hippocrates, in Latin hexameters, (1552.)

Lux, lŏoks, (ADAM,) a German republican, born at Mentz about 1770. He was sent to Paris in March, 1793, to solicit the annexation of his country to France. He witnessed with sympathy and admiration the conduct of Charlotte Corday at her execution. A few days later he published an apology for that heroine. For this and other offences he was executed in November, 1793.

Luxdorf, lŏoks'dorf, (BOLLE WILLUM,) a Danish writer and lawyer, born in the island of Seeland in 1716. He cultivated Latin poetry with success. Died in 1788.

Luxembourg, lük'sŏN'boor', (CHRISTIAN LOUIS DE MONTMORENCI,) Prince de Tingri, a French general, born in Paris in 1675, was the fourth son of the great Marshal Luxembourg. For his services at Oudenarde and Lille (1708) he obtained the rank of lieutenant-general. He commanded at Ettlingen in 1734, and was made a marshal of France in the same year. From that time he was called MARSHAL DE MONTMORENCI. Died in 1746.

See PINARD, "Chronologie militaire."

Luxembourg, de, dęh lük'sŏN'boor', (CHARLES FRANÇOIS FRÉDÉRIC DE MONTMORENCI,) MARSHAL, born in 1702, was a grandson of the first Marshal Luxembourg. He was aide-de-camp of Louis XV. in the war of 1741, and, having served with distinction in Germany, became a marshal of France. He gave a home to J. J. Rousseau at Montmorenci. (See the notice of his wife, below.) Died in 1764.

See ROUSSEAU, "Confessions."

Luxembourg, de, written also Luxemburg, (FRANÇOIS HENRI DE MONTMORENCI,) DUC, a celebrated marshal of France, born in Paris in 1628, was a son of the Count de Montmorenci-Bouteville, and a cousin-german of the great Prince de Condé. For his conduct at Lens in 1648 he was made maréchal-de-camp. From devotion to the Prince of Condé, he served several campaigns against France between 1653 and 1659, during which period Condé commanded the Spanish army. Having received a pardon from the king in 1660, he married the heiress of the house of Luxembourg, and assumed that name. In 1672 he obtained command of an army which invaded Holland and took several towns. His skilful retreat from Utrecht to Charleroi in November, 1673, raised him to the rank of the first captains of that age. In 1674 he commanded the right wing of Condé's army at Senef, and in 1675 received a marshal's bâton. He gained victories over the allies in Flanders in the campaign of 1677, which was followed by a long peace. Having incurred the enmity of Louvois, he was confined in the Bastille fourteen months on a charge of sorcery. In 1690, Louis XIV., against whom Austria, Spain, and England had formed a coalition, gave the chief command of his army to Marshal Luxembourg, who, since the death of Turenne and Condé, was the ablest of his generals. He defeated the allies at Fleurus in 1690. In the campaign of 1691 he defeated William III. of England at the great battle of Steenkerke. He was victorious over the same enemy and leader at Neerwinden, or Landen, in 1693. He died in January, 1695, after which the army of Louis gained few victories. "Even the admirers of William III.," says Macaulay, "were forced to own that in the field he was not a match for Luxembourg," whose "judgment was clearest and surest when responsibility pressed heaviest on him and when difficulties gathered thickest around him." "He gained immense renown at William's expense; but he had not the art of improving a victory, while William, of all generals, was best qualified to repair a defeat." ("History of England," vol. iv. chap. xix.)

Luxembourg, de, (MADELÈNE ANGÉLIQUE de Neufville-Villeroi—dęh nŭf'vèl' vèl'rwâ',) MARÉCHALE-DUCHESSE, born in 1707, was a granddaughter of Marshal Villeroi. She was married to Marshal C. F. de Luxembourg in 1750. About 1758 this couple gave Rousseau an asylum at Montmorenci. Rousseau has commemorated in his "Confessions" her charming conversation and liberality. Her rank and talents gave her great social influence in Paris. Died in 1787.

Luxembourg-Ligni, de, dęh lük'sŏN'boor' lèn'ye', (WALERAN,) Comte de Saint-Pol, was born in 1355, of one of the most illustrious families of Europe. While fighting for the French king, he was taken prisoner by the English in 1374. He married Matilda, a sister of Richard II. of England. Having been chosen Constable of France in 1412, he defeated the Armagnacs in battle. Died in 1417.

Luyken or Luycken, loi'kęn, (JAN,) a Dutch engraver, born in 1649, lived in Amsterdam. He etched, after his own designs, many admired works, which display a fertile invention. The "Death of Coligny" is called his best production. Died in 1712.

Luynes or Luines, de, dęh lü-èn', (CHARLES D'ALBERT,) DUC, the favourite of Louis XIII. of France, was born in Languedoc in 1578. As the companion of Louis in youth, he acquired an ascendency over him, and about 1616 he became his most powerful minister. His cupidity and ambition excited many enemies, among whom was the king's mother; but through his influence she was sent into exile. In 1621 he was appointed Constable of France, and declared war against the Huguenots. It appears that Louis had resolved to discard him; but before that purpose was effected Luynes died, in December, 1621. He was a brother of Marshal Chaulnes, noticed in this work.

Luynes, de, (HONORÉ THÉODORIC PAUL JOSEPH D'ALBERT,) DUC, a French antiquary, born in Paris in 1802, was a liberal patron of arts and sciences. He was admitted in 1830 into the Academy of Inscriptions, to which he contributed many valuable treatises on antiquities and medals. Died at Rome, December 14, 1867.

Luyts, loits, (JAN,) a Dutch philosopher and astronomer, born at Horn about 1660, became professor of physics at Utrecht. He was an opponent of the Cartesian philosophy. Died in 1721.

Luz, lüz, ? [Lat. LU'CIUS,] (LOUIS,) a Swiss Protestant theologian, born at Bâle in 1577. He wrote a "History of the Jesuits," (1626,) and other works. Died in 1642.

Luzac, lü'zâk', (ELIAS,) a Dutch philosopher and jurist, born near Leyden in 1723. He published in 1756 "Researches into the Principles of Human Knowledge." His "Riches of Holland," (1778,) a history of Dutch commerce, is highly esteemed. Died in 1796.

Luzac, (JAN,) a philologist and publicist of great merit, born at Leyden in 1746. He practised law in his native place. In 1775 he became chief editor of the "Gazette de Leyde." From 1785 until 1796 he was professor of Greek in Leyden University. He corresponded with Washington and Jefferson, the former of whom wrote, "America is under great obligations to the writings and actions of such men as you." Among his works are "Socrates as a Citizen," ("De Socrate Cive,") dedicated to John Adams, of Massachusetts, and "Attic Readings," ("Lectiones Atticæ," 1809.) He was killed by an explosion of gunpowder at Leyden in 1807.

See SIEGENBEEK, "Notice sur la Vie et les Travaux de J. Luzac."

Luzac, (STEVEN,) the uncle of the preceding, was born at Leyden in 1706. He became in 1738 proprietor and editor of the "Gazette de Leyde," which is described as a model of accuracy and wisdom, and possessed much historical value. Died in 1787.

Luzan, loo-thân′, (Don IGNACIO,) a Spanish critic, poet, and literary reformer, born at Saragossa in 1702. About 1750 he was appointed director of the mint, a councillor of state, and minister of commerce. To counteract the vicious poetical style of Gongora, he wrote his celebrated "Art of Poetry," ("La Poetica, o Reglas de la Poesia en general," 1737,) which is said to have been effectual in rectifying the national taste. He produced several admired poems, one of which is "The Judgment of Paris." Died in 1754.

Luzarches, de, dẹh lü′zȧrsh′, (ROBERT,) a French architect, designed the magnificent cathedral of Amiens, which was commenced in 1220 and finished in 1269.

Luzerne, de la, dẹh lȧ lü′zȧrn′, (ANNE CÉSAR,) CHEVALIER, a French diplomatist, born in Paris in 1741. In 1779 he was sent as minister to the United States, where he had much influence, and performed with credit the duties of a position which the absence of instructions made more responsible. He left the United States in 1783. He was ambassador from France to London from 1788 until his death, in September, 1791.

Luzerne, de la, (CÉSAR GUILLAUME,) a learned prelate, born in Paris in 1738, was a brother of the preceding. He became Bishop of Langres in 1770, and was elected to the States-General in 1789. He emigrated in 1791, returned in 1814, and was made a cardinal in 1817. Among his numerous works is "Considerations on Divers Points of Christian Morality," (5 vols., 1795.) Died in 1821.

See QUÉRARD, "La France Littéraire."

Luzerne, de la, (CÉSAR HENRI,) COUNT, a French minister of state, born in Paris in 1737, was a brother of the preceding, and a nephew of Malesherbes. He was appointed minister of the marine in 1787. The hostility of the dominant party caused him to resign in 1790. He emigrated in 1791, and died in Austria in 1799.

Luzzatto, loot-sât′to, (PHILOXENE,) a Jewish linguist, a son of S. D. Luzzatto, was born at Triest, July 10, 1829. He mastered twelve or more languages, and published various treatises, chiefly on Sanscrit, Assyrian, and other ancient tongues. Died January 25, 1854.

Luzzatto, (SAMUEL DAVID,) a Jewish scholar, born at Triest, in Austria, August 22, 1800. In early life he wrote against the Cabbalists and published some volumes of Hebrew verse. In 1829 he was made professor of biblical literature in the Rabbinical College of Padua. He wrote various theological treatises, commentaries, etc., and left a nearly complete Italian version of the Old Testament. Died at Padua, September 30, 1865.

Lyæus, lī-ee′us, [Gr. Λυαῖος, from λύω, to "free" or "loosen,"] a surname given to Bacchus, because he (wine) frees the mind from care; though some say it is because he loosens the limbs of his votaries, rendering them unable to walk. (See BACCHUS.)

Ly′all, (Sir ALFRED COMYNS,) K.C.B., an English writer, born at Coulston, Surrey, in 1835. He was educated at Eton, and at Haileybury College, was appointed home secretary in India in 1873, foreign secretary in 1878, and Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West Provinces in 1882. He published "Asiatic Studies," (1882,) etc., and is a singularly able and original writer in prose and verse.

Ly-cor′tas [Λυκόρτας] of Megalopolis, an Achæan general, was the father of Polybius the historian, and a friend of Philopœmen. He was sent as ambassador to Rome in 189 B.C. Died after 168 B.C.

Lycosthenes, le-kos′tȧ-nẹs, (CONRAD,) the Greek name of CONRAD WOLFFHART, a scholar, born in Alsace in 1518. He became minister of a church in Bâle in 1545, and published a curious work on "Prodigies," ("Prodigiorum Chronicon,") a new edition of Gesner's "Bibliotheca," and other works. Died in 1561.

Ly-cur′gus, [Gr. Λυκοῦργος; Fr. LYCURGUE, le′kürg′,] in classic mythology, a king of Thrace, who is said to have been a persecutor of Bacchus, and to have been punished with madness. According to another tradition, Jupiter deprived him of sight.

Lycurgus, [Gr. Λυκοῦργος; Fr. LYCURGUE, le′kürg′; Ger. LYKURGUS, le-kŏŏr′gŏŏs,] a famous Spartan lawgiver, who belongs to the period anterior to authentic history. Plutarch begins his biography with the remark that nothing certain can be said concerning him. According to Aristotle, he lived more than 850 years B.C. He is supposed to have been the son of King Eunomus, who was succeeded by another son, Polydectes. At the death of the latter, Lycurgus refused the crown, and defended the right of Charilaus, a posthumous son of Polydectes. He visited many foreign countries, whose institutions he studied, and, after a long absence, returned to Sparta, where he made social and political changes of the most radical kind. His constitution was considered by the Greeks as the model of a perfect aristocracy, but contained a strong democratic element. The executive power was divided between two persons called kings. A remarkable feature in his system was the equal division or community of property, which existed to an extent unequalled in any other country in ancient or modern times. The interference of the state with domestic affairs and relations was carried to a great excess. His laws were based on the idea that men are made for the government, rather than the government for men. He is said to have prohibited the use of gold and silver money, and abolished all professions among the Spartans except that of arms, assigning all mechanical and menial employment to the slaves, (Helots,) who appear to have been treated with great severity. Having imposed on the people an oath that they would not alter his laws during his absence, he went into voluntary exile, from which he never returned. Tradition informs us that he vanished mysteriously from the earth. The Spartans erected a temple to him, and paid him divine honours. According to one legend, he ordered his ashes to be cast into the sea after his death, fearing that if his body were conveyed to Sparta the Spartans might think themselves absolved from their oath.

Lycurgus, an eminent Athenian orator, born about 400 B.C., was the son of Lycophron. He is said to have studied philosophy under Plato, and eloquence under Isocrates. For about fifteen years he presided over the public revenue with a high reputation for integrity and financial ability. In the contest with Philip of Macedon he supported the democratic party. He was one of the orators whom Alexander required Athens to deliver up to him in 335 B.C. This demand was firmly refused. Fifteen of his orations were extant in the time of Plutarch, and only one (that against Leocrates) has come down to us. His style is noble rather than elegant. Died in 323 B.C.

Lȳd'gate, (JOHN,) an old English poet, born about 1375, became a monk of the abbey of Bury Saint Edmund's. He was ordained a priest in 1397, after which he travelled on the continent. On his return, he opned at the abbey above named a school, in which he taught languages, rhetoric, and versification. He acquired a high reputation as a poet. Among his numerous works are "The Story of Thebes," "The Fall of Princes," and the "History, Siege, and Destruction of Troy." Died about 1460.

See WARTON, "History of English Poetry."

Lȳd'ĭ-at, (THOMAS,) an English chronologer and mathematician, was born at Okerton in 1572. He became rector of Okerton about 1612. During the civil war he suffered persecution for his loyalty to Charles I., and he died very poor in 1646. His adversities are commemorated in these verses of Dr. Johnson:

> "If dreams yet flatter, once again attend:
> Hear Lydiat's life and Galileo's end."

Among his works (in Latin) are a Censure of Scaliger's Chronology, ("Emendatio Temporum contra Scaligerum," 1609,) "The Period of the Sun and Moon," and "The Measurement of the Solar Year."

Lye, lī, (EDWARD,) an English philologist and clergyman, born at Totness in 1704. Soon after he left college he obtained the living of Houghton Parva, and in 1750 became vicar of Yardley Hastings. He acquired distinction by his researches into the Saxon language and literature. In 1743 he published the "Etymologicon Anglicanum," which Francis Junius had left in manuscript. His chief work is his "Anglo-Saxon and Gothic Dictionary," (1772.) Died in 1767.

Lȳ'ell, (CHARLES,) a Scottish botanist, born about 1767, resided at Kinnordy, Forfarshire. He was the father of the geologist of the same name. Died in 1849.

Lyell, (Sir CHARLES,) an eminent British geologist, a son of the preceding, was born at Kinnordy, in Forfarshire, in November, 1797. He graduated at Oxford in 1821, and studied law, but soon relinquished the practice of that profession in order to devote his time to geology. About 1826 he began to contribute to the "Transactions of the Geological Society" a series of papers which display superior powers of observation and comparison, and in 1830 published the first volume of his important work, "Principles of Geology," (3 vols., 1830–33,) which was very favourably received. It reached the fifth edition in 1837. He afterwards divided the work into two parts, one of which was published under the title of "Elements of Geology," (1838.) In a subsequent edition the name was changed to "Manual of Elementary Geology." It is generally admitted that his work contributed much to place geology on a philosophical basis as an inductive science. Having visited the United States in 1841, he lectured on geology at Boston, and after his return published "Travels in North America, with Geological Observations on the United States, Canada, and Nova Scotia," (2 vols., 1845.) He also wrote many treatises on the geology of America, which were printed in the "Transactions" of the Geological Society, and in other journals. In 1845 he made another excursion to the United States, the result of which was a "Second Visit to the United States," (2 vols., 1849.) Both of these books of travel contain much to interest the general reader. Mr. Lyell was knighted in 1848. He was elected president of the Geological Society in 1836, and again in 1850. He published in 1863 "The Geological Evidences of the Antiquity of Man, with Remarks on Theories of the Origin of Species by Variation." He was formerly prominent among the opponents of the "development" or Darwinian theory; but later in life he changed his views in that respect. Died February 22, 1875.

Lȳnd'hurst, (JOHN SINGLETON COPLEY,) LORD, an eminent English statesman, born at Boston, Massachusetts, in 1772, was the son of the distinguished painter John S. Copley, who took him to England about 1775. He was educated at Cambridge, and chose the profession of law. Having gradually risen to be the leader of the Midland circuit, he was elected to Parliament as a Tory in 1818, and appointed solicitor-general in 1819, when he was also knighted. Sir John became attorney-general in 1824, and was returned to Parliament by the University of Cambridge in 1826. After opposing the bill for Catholic emancipation, he accepted the office of lord chancellor in the Liberal ministry of Canning in April, 1827, and was raised to the peerage, as Baron Lyndhurst. Having been retained in his office by the Duke of Wellington, he voted in concurrence with his colleagues for Catholic emancipation in 1829. In November, 1830, the Liberal party, under Earl Grey, came into power, and Lord Lyndhurst was deprived of the great seal; but in 1831 he was appointed chief baron of the exchequer. He made an able speech against the Reform bill in 1832. In the court of exchequer he displayed eminent judicial qualifications. He was again lord chancellor during the brief ministry of Sir Robert Peel in 1834. In August, 1841, Sir Robert became premier, and Lord Lyndhurst lord chancellor, of a new Conservative ministry, which was deprived of power by the triumph of the Whigs in 1846. After that date, until near his death, he was one of the most prominent orators of his party in the House of Lords. He advocated the prosecution of the Russian war (1854–56) in several eloquent speeches. Died in 1863.

Lȳ-san'dẹr, [Gr. Λύσανδρος; Fr. LYSANDRE, le'zôNdR';
Ger. LYSANDROS, le-zân'dros,] one of the ablest generals and statesmen of ancient Sparta, makes his first appearance in history near the close of the Peloponnesian war. In 407 B.C. he was chosen commander of the fleet, with which he gained a victory over the Athenians at Notium in that year. He made himself very popular with the Persian allies of Sparta, and he defeated the Athenian fleet in a decisive battle at Ægospotami in 405. In 404 he captured Athens, and changed its democracy into an oligarchy ruled by thirty archons, (usually called the Thirty Tyrants.) He was then the most powerful man in Greece, but soon found an able rival in Agesilaus, who became King of Sparta in 398 B.C. and thwarted his ambitious designs. Lysander meditated a revolution in Sparta by the abolition of hereditary royalty. Before his design was matured, he was appointed commander of an army sent against the Thebans, and was killed in battle at Haliartus in 395 B.C. In Plutarch's "Lives" Lysander is brought into comparison with the Roman Sulla.

Lyschander or Lyscander, lis-kăn'dẹr, (CLAUDIUS CHRISTOPHORSEN,) a Danish chronicler, born in 1557. He wrote a "Chronicle of Greenland," in Danish verse, (1608,) and flattered the national vanity in a fabulous work on the genealogy of the Danish kings, entitled "Synopsis of Danish History," ("Synopsis Historiæ Danicæ," 1622.) Died in 1623.

Lyser, lee'zẹr, originally Leonhardt, lā'on-hart', (CAROLINE,) a German authoress, born at Dresden in 1817. Among her works are fugitive poems, "Sketches of Character for German Matrons and Maids," (1838,) and "Albert Dürer," a drama, (1840.)

Lyser, (MICHAEL,) a German anatomist, born at Leipsic about 1650. He published a good manual of anatomy, entitled "Culter Anatomicus," (1653.) He shares with Bartholin the honour of the discovery of the lymphatic vessels.

Lyser or Lyserus, (POLYCARP.) See LEYSER.

Lysias, lish'e-as, [Λυσίας,] one of the ten Athenian orators, was born at Athens in 458 B.C., and was the son of Cephalus, in whose house Plato placed the scene of his famous dialogue "On the Republic." From 443 until 411 he lived at Thurium, in Italy, from which he was expelled by the victorious Spartans at the latter date. He then returned to Athens, where his property was confiscated by the Thirty Tyrants, who would have put him to death if he had not escaped, 404 B.C. Soon after that date he united with Thrasybulus in the expulsion of the Thirty, and opened a school of rhetoric in Athens. His orations, amounting to more than two hundred, were mostly composed after his return to Athens, (411.) Thirty-four of these have come down to us. Lysias died at Athens about 378 B.C., leaving a high reputation as a writer of orations, only one of which, it is said, was spoken by him. His diction is eminently graceful, pure, and perspicuous. "He resembles," says Quintilian, "rather a pure fountain than a great river," ("puro fonti quam magno flumini propior.")

See PLUTARCH, "Vitæ Decem Oratorum;" FRANZ, "Dissertatio de Lysia Oratore Attico," (in Greek,) 1838; SUIDAS, "Lysias;" L. HORLSCHER, "Dissertatio de Lysiæ Vita et Dictione," 1837

Lȳ-sic'rą-tēs, [Λυσικράτης,] an Athenian, who lived about 335 B.C., and whose name has been preserved by means of a beautiful choragic monument built for him at Athens. It has been commonly called "the Lantern of Demosthenes," from a tradition that he used it as a place of study.

Lȳ-sim'ą-chus, [Gr. Λυσίμαχος; Fr. LYSIMAQUE, le'ze'măk',] King of Thrace, was born in Macedonia about 355 B.C. In his youth he was so distinguished for courage and strength that Alexander the Great chose him as one of his body-guards. In the division of provinces at the death of Alexander, (323,) Lysimachus obtained Thrace and some adjacent districts. In 315 he joined Seleucus, Cassander, and Ptolemy in a coalition against Antigonus. Lysimachus marched into Asia Minor, formed a junction with Seleucus, and fought a battle at Ipsus in 301 B.C., where Antigonus was defeated and killed. By this victory he acquired the northwestern part of Asia Minor. Demetrius of Macedon having been defeated and dethroned by the allied armies of Lysimachus, Pyrrhus, and Seleucus, the first annexed Macedon to his dominions in 286. He was soon after involved in a war with Seleucus, and was killed in battle at Corupedion in 281 B.C.

Lysippus, [Gr. Λύσιππος; Fr. LYSIPPE, le'zĕp',] a Greek statuary of great celebrity, was born at Sicyon, and flourished in the reign of Alexander the Great, about 330 B.C. He formed his style by the imitation of nature, without much respect to the conventionalities of the schools. His statues and groups, according to the best authorities, were some fifteen hundred in number, all or nearly all of which were of bronze. None of his works are known to be extant, though several well-authenticated copies are to be seen. Among his master-pieces, described by Pliny, Pausanias, and others, were colossal statues of Zeus and Hercules, a statue of Time or Opportunity, (Καιρός,) and several images of Alexander the Great, who is said to have issued an edict that no one should make his statue but Lysippus.

Mac-Ar'dell, (JAMES,) an excellent English engraver in mezzotinto, born about 1710. He engraved portraits of many eminent contemporaries, and subjects after Rembrandt, Van Dyck, Murillo, and other masters. Among his works are "Moses on the Nile," after Van Dyck, and an "Assumption," after Murillo. Died in 1765. Of MacArdell Basan observes that he "was one of the best engravers in mezzotinto that England ever produced."

See STRUTT, article "Ardell" in his "Dictionary of Engravers."

Macarel, mȧ'kȧ'rĕl', (LOUIS ANTOINE,) a French jurist, born at Orléans in 1790. He published, besides other works, "Elements of Administrative Jurisprudence," (1818.) Died in 1851.

Mạ-cā'rĭ-us, [Gr. Μακάριος; Fr. MACAIRE, mȧ'kȧR',] an eminent ascetic or hermit of Egypt, born about 300 A.D., has been canonized as a saint by the Catholic Church. Fifty extant Greek homilies are ascribed to him. Died about 390 A.D.

Another SAINT MACARIUS, called Junior, lived at Alexandria in the fourth century, and was noted for his ascetic piety. He is supposed to be the author of a work called the "Rule of Saint Macarius."

Mạc-ar'thur, (DUNCAN,) an American soldier and statesman, born in Dutchess county, New York, in 1772. He served in the war of 1812, and rose to the rank of brigadier-general. He was elected Governor of Ohio in 1830. Died in 1840.

Mac-Ar'thur, (JOHN,) a general, born in Scotland about 1826, emigrated to Illinois about 1850. He commanded a brigade of the Union army at Shiloh, April, 1862, and at Corinth, in October of the same year.

MacArthur, (JOHN,) a distinguished architect, born at Bladenoch, in Wigtonshire, Scotland, May 13, 1823, came to Philadelphia when only ten years of age. He learned the business of a carpenter, and studied drawing and architecture in his evenings. In 1848 he was awarded the first premium for his plan of a new House of Refuge, and was given the entire charge of the erection of the building. Among the prominent buildings erected by him in Philadelphia, we may name the Continental Hotel and Jayne's splendid mansion at the corner of Nineteenth and Chestnut streets. He was architect for the war department during the war, and after its close for the navy department, for which he built the Naval Hospital at Philadelphia, and other similar works.

Mạc-art'ney, (GEORGE,) EARL OF, a statesman, of Scottish descent, born near Belfast, Ireland, in 1737. He was elected to Parliament in 1768, and appointed chief secretary for Ireland in 1769. In 1775 he was chosen Governor of the island of Granada, which the French captured from him in 1779. From December, 1780, to 1786, he was Governor of Madras. He was appointed Governor-General of India, as successor to Warren Hastings, but declined on account of ill health. His most remarkable public service was his embassy to China, where he arrived in August, 1793, being the first English ambassador to that court. He refused to prostrate himself before the emperor, according to Chinese etiquette. Though he failed to obtain a commercial treaty, he maintained his reputation as an able negotiator. He was raised to the peerage as a baron in 1776, and was made Earl of Macartney in 1794. He died in 1806, after which appeared a "Journal of the Embassy to China in 1792–94."

Macaulay, mạ-kaw'le, (CATHARINE,) an English authoress, whose maiden name was SAWBRIDGE, was born in Kent in 1733. She was married to Dr. George Macaulay, of London, about 1760, and published a "History of England from the Accession of James I. to the Elevation of the House of Hanover," (1763,) which is favourable to republicanism. In 1785 she visited Washington at Mount Vernon. She wrote several political treatises. "Her history," says T. B. Macaulay,

"is more distinguished by zeal than either by candour or skill." Died in 1791.

Macaulay, (THOMAS BABINGTON,) BARON, an eminent English scholar, critic, and historian, was born at Rothley Temple, in Leicestershire, October 25, 1800. His father, Zachary Macaulay, was a native of Scotland, of Highland descent; his mother, Selina Mills, the daughter of a bookseller of Bristol, was of a Quaker family. His home education was religious and somewhat austere. Mrs. Hannah More, who was intimate with his parents, has given in her letters many interesting particulars of the future historian. From his earliest childhood he was passionately fond of poetry,—so much so that he could hardly be prevailed on to read prose. Later, however, we find him deeply interested in history, and warmly discussing with a friend of his own age the respective merits of Marlborough and other eminent commanders. (See "Letters of Hannah More to Zachary Macaulay, containing Notices of Lord Macaulay's Youth," 1860.)

When about twelve years of age, he was placed under the instruction of Mr. Preston, with whom he laid the foundations of his acquaintance with the classics. At eighteen he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, where he greatly distinguished himself, having twice won the chancellor's medal for English verse,—the first time for a poem on "Pompeii," in 1819, the second for one on "Evening," in 1820. He graduated as B.A. in 1822, and soon after was chosen a Fellow of his college. He studied law at Lincoln's Inn, and was admitted to the bar in 1826. "The Battle of Ivry," one of the most universally admired of his shorter poems, was published in "Knight's Quarterly Magazine" in 1824. In 1825 he contributed to the "Edinburgh Review" an article on Milton, which at once placed him in the foremost rank of the most distinguished essayists of the age. This was the commencement of that splendid and fascinating series of review-articles, the publication of which may be said to form an era in the history of literature, when for the first time the critical or historic essay threatened to bear away the palm of popularity from the most brilliant works of fiction.

Macaulay entered Parliament in 1830, as a representative of the borough of Calne. While at Cambridge he had distinguished himself as an orator, and he now more than justified the high expectations which his friends had formed of his parliamentary career. His speeches on the Reform bill (in 1830–32) established his fame as an able and eloquent speaker. It is said, however, that, owing to his rapid and somewhat monotonous delivery, his speeches were more effective and convincing when they appeared in print than when spoken in the House of Commons. One of his most remarkable efforts was his great speech (1833) on the bill for the renewal of the charter of the East India Company. He was soon after made a member of the supreme council of India, and placed at the head of the law commission to prepare a new code for the government of that country. Although it was found impossible to carry into immediate effect many of the reforms which he sought to introduce, his efforts in this cause have not been without important results. Since the government of India was transferred to the imperial crown, his code has been made the basis of the legal system of the country. His sojourn in India (from 1835 to 1838) had made him acquainted with its history and with the character of its various peoples; and to the knowledge thus acquired in a field hitherto untrodden by him, we are indebted for two of his most effective and most brilliant essays,—those on Clive and Warren Hastings.

Having returned to England in 1838, he again entered Parliament, as a representative of the city of Edinburgh, and soon after received the appointment of secretary at war in the Melbourne ministry. On the fall of the Whigs in 1841, he went into the opposition. When they returned to power in 1846, he was made paymaster-general. He had been regularly re-elected from Edinburgh until 1847, when, owing to an unusual combination of different party elements, he was defeated. The mortification of this repulse stung him very deeply. He resolved to devote the remainder of his life to studious retirement. He seems to have felt, indeed, that his proper vocation was the pursuit of literature, apart from the excitements of the political arena. One of the important results of his withdrawal from public life was his being able to apply himself without interruption to the composition of his great work, the "History of England," the first two volumes of which made their appearance near the close of 1848. Never before in the annals of literature was any work of history welcomed by the public with such enthusiastic admiration. His work was read by tens of thousands with as much eagerness and delight as a fresh novel by Scott or Bulwer would have been. In 1849 Macaulay was chosen lord rector of the University of Glasgow. Not long after, in a speech which he made in that city, he took a formal leave of political life, explaining at the same time the principles by which he had sought to guide his course while he was connected with the government. Among other things, he said on that occasion, "I cannot accuse myself of having ever been untrue either to the cause of civil or religious liberty, or to the cause of property and law. I reflect with pleasure that I bore a part in some of those reforms which corrected great abuses and removed just discontents. I reflect with equal pleasure that I never stooped to the part of a demagogue, and never feared to confront what seemed to me to be an unreasonable clamour." In 1852 the people of Edinburgh, as some atonement for the injustice which they felt had been done him five years before, again returned Macaulay to Parliament, without his having so much as offered himself as a candidate or having made the smallest effort to procure his re-election. Although he took his seat in the House of Commons, his declining health did not permit him to take any active part in the debates. During the whole time that he was in the House he spoke but twice: on both occasions he was listened to with the most respectful and eager attention. An imperfect and extremely inaccurate collection of his speeches having been printed without his sanction, a correct edition was by his authority issued in 1854. In 1856, on account of ill health, he resigned his seat in Parliament. In 1855 the third and fourth volumes of his History made their appearance. They were welcomed as warmly and read as eagerly as the two former had been. It was his original purpose to bring his History from the accession of James II. down to a time within the memory of persons still living. But in the last volume he had only reached the peace of Ryswick, in 1697. After his decease another fragmentary volume was published, including an account of the death of William III.

In 1857 Macaulay was raised to the peerage, with the title of Baron Macaulay of Rothley. Although his health continued to decline, he still applied himself to his literary labours until very near the time of his death. His disease was an affection of the heart, of which he died suddenly on the 28th of December, 1859.

Besides the various productions of his pen already referred to, he contributed a series of valuable biographies to the "Encyclopædia Britannica." Not content with his acknowledged mastery in the different departments of prose, he became again in 1842 a candidate for poetic laurels, and gave to the world his "Lays of Ancient Rome," of which it is scarcely too much to say that, for a combination of picturesqueness, simplicity, and power, there is nothing of the kind superior to them in the English language.

It is, however, as a writer on history that the name of Macaulay is destined to take its most distinguished place and descend to the remotest posterity. Already, in his essays, he had proved his mastery in this department of composition. A perfect history, according to his ideal,* would not be content with merely recording wars and revolutions, the lives of kings and heroes, but would include literature and the arts, manners and usages, the progress of civilization,—in short, the whole life of the nation; not of the aristocracy only, but of the people in every rank and condition Referring to Macaulay's historic essays, Dean Milman well observes, "The variety of topics is almost as nothing to the variety of information on every topic." Of the style he remarks, "It was eminently his own. . . . Its characteristics were vigour, animation, copiousness, clearness,—above all, sound English, now a rare excellence. . . . His English was pure both in idiom and in words; pure to fastidiousness; not that he discarded or did not make free use of the plainest and most homely terms, . . . but every word must be plain English,—nothing that approached real vulgarity, nothing that had not the stamp of popular use or the authority of sound English writers."

That Macaulay possessed in a pre-eminent degree many of the highest attributes of a great historian, none will deny. In that power of imagination by which he was enabled to clothe the dead past with all the activity and fulness of life, he was scarcely, if at all, inferior to the most gifted writers of fiction. In the extent and variety of his knowledge, in the quickness and strength of his intellect, by which he was able to grasp with facility the most difficult political and moral problems, in his thorough acquaintance with all the springs of human action, in the vividness of his descriptions, in the animation and sustained interest of his narrative, in the clearness, force, and brilliancy of his style, in his command, in short, over every species of eloquence, whether declamatory, argumentative, or poetical, he has, even among the greatest masters of historical composition, few, if any, superiors. He is, however, it must be confessed with regret, deficient in one important or rather essential qualification,—impartiality. His feelings were so intense, his attachments and aversions so strong, that, where these chanced to enter into the subject to be weighed, the balance was too seldom held with an equal hand.

Macaulay's great work has been compared to a vast painting, in which the different figures correspond to prominent historic characters. It may be said that as in his style he too often sacrifices simplicity to his love of antithesis, so in his history he is too apt to exaggerate, for the sake of effect, the lights and shadows of his portraits.

In relation to his conversational powers, Dean Milman observes, "In the quiet intercourse with the single friend, no great talker was more free, easy, and genial than Macaulay. There was the most equable interchange of thought; he listened with as much courtesy as he spoke with gentle and pleasant persuasiveness. In a larger circle, such as he delighted to meet and assemble around him to the close of his life, a few chosen intimates, some accomplished ladies, foreigners of the highest distinction who were eager to make his acquaintance, his manners were frank and open. In conversation in such a circle, a commanding voice, high animal spirits, unrivalled quickness of apprehension, a flow of language as rapid as inexhaustible, gave him, perhaps, a larger share, but a share which few were not delighted to yield up to him. His thoughts were like lightning, and clothed themselves at once in words. . . . And the stores which his memory had at instantaneous command! . . . With these came anecdotes, touches of character, drollery, fun, excellent stories excellently told."

"Lord Macaulay," observes the same writer, "was never married; his strong domestic affections were chiefly centred in his sister—happily married to his friend Sir Charles Trevelyan—and her family. Her children were to him as his own, and cherished with almost parental tenderness. As a friend he was singularly steadfast. He was impatient of anything disparaging of one for whom he entertained a sincere esteem. In the war of political life he made, we believe, no lasting enemy; he secured the unswerving attachment of his political friends, to whom he had been unswervingly true."

All Macaulay's works have been reprinted in Germany. His "History" has been translated into French, the first two volumes by M. Jules de Peyronnet, the second and third by M. Amédée Pichot.

Macaulay, (ZACHARY,) F.R.S., an English philanthropist, of Scottish descent, born about 1768, was the father of Lord Macaulay, the historian. He was a zealous coadjutor of Wilberforce in the abolition of the slave-trade, in which cause he laboured many years. Died in 1838. His father, John Macaulay, minister at Inverary, is mentioned in Dr. Johnson's "Tour to the Hebrides."

Mac-Au'ley, (CATHERINE E.,) an Irish lady, eminent for benevolence and piety, born in the county of Dublin in 1787. She was educated a Catholic. Having lost her parents in early life, she was adopted by Mr. Callahan, a wealthy gentleman, who at his death, in 1822, left her his entire fortune. She founded in 1827, in Baggot Street, Dublin, an institution designed as a temporary home for poor women out of employment, and a school for children. It was afterwards called the Institute of Our Blessed Lady of Mercy, having for its object the care of the sick. She became in 1831 superior of the Order of the Sisters of Mercy. This order has been introduced into Great Britain, the United States, Australia, and South America. Died in 1841.

See "Life of Catherine MacAuley," by a member of the Order of Mercy, New York, 1866.

Mac-bĕth' or Macbéda, mak-bā'ṫha, a king of Scotland, who, according to the common tradition, was a cousin of King Duncan, and originally Thane of Glamis. About 1040 Macbeth assassinated Duncan and usurped the throne. Malcolm, the lawful heir, fled to England, and, having returned with an army, defeated Macbeth, who was killed in 1056 or 1057.

The story of Macbeth's usurpation would seem to possess scarcely any positive historic basis. "However he may have gained his power," says Burton, "he exercised it with good repute, according to the reports nearest to his time. It is among the most curious of the antagonisms that sometimes separate the popular opinion of people of mark from anything positively known about them, that this man, in a manner sacred to splendid infamy, is the first whose name appears in the ecclesiastical records both as a king of Scotland and a benefactor of the Church. . . . He had a wider dominion than any previous ruler, having command over all the country now known as Scotland, except the isles and a portion of the western highlands." ("History of Scotland," vol. i. chap. x.) The legend of Macbeth forms the subject of one of Shakspeare's most celebrated tragedies.

Mąc-Brīde', (DAVID,) an eminent surgeon, born in the county of Antrim, Ireland, in 1726, settled in Dublin in 1749. Besides other works, he published an "Introduction to the Theory and Practice of Medicine," (1772,) which is much esteemed. Died in 1778.

Maccabæus, (JUDAS.) See JUDAS.

Mąc-Cābe', (EDWARD,) an Irish cardinal, born at Dublin, February 14, 1816, was bred at Maynooth, and made a priest in 1839. In 1877 he became bishop and assistant to Cardinal Cullen, to whom he had for several years been a vicar-general. In 1879 he became Archbishop of Dublin, and in 1882 he was created a cardinal-priest. Died at Kingstown, Ireland, February 10, 1885.

MacCabe, (WILLIAM BERNARD,) an Irish journalist, born in Dublin, November 23, 1801. For many years he was connected with the press of Dublin and London, and was (1847–51) Uruguayan consul at London. Besides various books translated from the Italian and German, he published a "Catholic History of England," (1848–54,) novels entitled "Bertha," (1851,) "Florine," "Agnes Arnold," (1860,) "Adelaide," etc., and other works.

Mac'ca-beēs, [Gr. Μακκαβαῖοι; Fr. MACCABÉES, mă'-kă'bā',] a celebrated Jewish family, which attained the royal dignity in Judea. The surname MACCABÆUS, from the Hebrew Makkab, a "hammer," was first given to Judas for his victories over the King of Syria, about 165 B.C. His family and descendants were also called Maccabees or Asmonæans. Judas, who was the son of Mattathias, had three brothers, John, Simon, and Jonathan, noticed in this work.

Mac-Câll', (GEORGE A.,) an American general, born in Philadelphia in 1802, graduated at West Point in 1822. He took command of a division or corps called the Pennsylvania Reserves, about May, 1861, and commanded the same at Mechanicsville and Gaines's Mill, June 26–27, 1862. He was taken prisoner June 30 of that year. Died in February, 1868.

Mac-Car'thy, (DENIS FLORENCE,) an Irish author, born at Cork in 1820. He was appointed professor of poetry in the Catholic University of Dublin, and in 1871 was made the recipient of a literary pension of one hundred pounds per annum. Among his works are translations from Calderon's dramas, (1853,) "Ballads, Poems, and Lyrics," (1850,) "Under-Glimpses," (1857,) "The Bell-Founder, and other Poems," (1857,) "Shelley's Early Life," (1872,) etc. He also edited a "Book of Irish Ballads," (1846.) Died April 7, 1882.

MacCarthy, (JUSTIN,) an Irish author, born at Cork, November 22, 1830. He received a good education, and became a journalist of Liverpool (1853) and London, (1860.) He passed several years in the United States. In 1879 he was returned to Parliament as a Home-Ruler, representing the county of Longford, and in 1880 was re-elected with no opposition. Among his works are "The Waterdale Neighbours," (1867,) "My Enemy's Daughter," (1869,) "Lady Judith," (1871,) "A Fair Saxon," (1873,) "Linley Rochford," (1874,) "Dear Lady Disdain," (1875.) "Miss Misanthrope," (1877,) "Con Amore," (1881,) "A History of Our Own Times," a work of much merit, (1878–80,) "The Epoch of Reform," (1882,) "A Short History of Our Own Times," and a "History of the Four Georges," (1884.)

Mac-Caul', (Rev. ALEXANDER,) an English Hebraist and writer on theology, was born about 1800. He became prebendary of Saint Paul's, London, in 1845. Died in 1863.

MacCheyne, mak-shān', (ROBERT MURRAY,) a Scottish divine, born at Edinburgh in 1813. He studied theology under Dr. Chalmers in the university of his native city, and in 1836 was ordained minister of Saint Peter's, Dundee. His earnest and faithful labours were instrumental in converting great numbers during the memorable revival of 1839. He died in 1843, leaving a number of hymns of great beauty.

Macchi, mâk'kee, (MAURO,) an Italian political writer, born at Milan in 1815. He was a moderate Liberal in politics. Died in 1880.

Macchiavelli or Machiavelli, de, dà mâ-ke-â-vel'-lee, often Anglicized as Machiavel, mak'e-a-vĕl, [Lat. MACHIAVEL'LUS; Fr. MACHIAVEL, mă'she'ă'vĕl',] (NICCOLÒ DI BERNARDO,) a famous Italian statesman, diplomatist, and writer, whose character abounds in enigmas and paradoxes, and from whose name has been derived a synonym of perfidious policy, (Machiavellism.) He was born at Florence on the 3d of May, 1469. In 1499 he was appointed secretary of the Ten who managed the diplomatic affairs of the republic. He retained this office about fourteen years, during which he was employed in many foreign missions to France, etc., and acquitted himself with great dexterity. In 1510, for the third time, he was sent to France, and negotiated an alliance with Louis XII. He zealously exerted his talents and influence to maintain the independence of Florence, but without success. In 1512 the Medicis obtained sovereign power in Florence by the aid of the pope and the emperor, and Macchiavelli was banished from the city, but forbidden to leave the country. He passed several ensuing years in retirement, and during this period composed a treatise on the "Art of War," and his important work entitled "The Prince," ("Del Principe," or "De Principatibus,") which has entailed a large portion of conventional infamy on his name. It was written for the private use of Lorenzo de' Medici, and not designed for publication. "Few books," says Hallam, "have been more misrepresented. His crime, in the eyes of the world, was to have cast away the veil of hypocrisy." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") About 1520 he was recalled into public service by Leo X., and was employed on several missions, the last of which was to the army of the league against Charles V., (1526.) He died at Florence in June, 1527. His last work was an excellent, luminous, and picturesque history of Florence, ("Storie Fiorentine," 1525,) the style of which is greatly admired. He was also author of several comedies of some merit, and of valuable "Discourses on Livy." "The character of Macchiavelli," says Macaulay, "was hateful to the new masters of Italy. His works were misrepresented by the learned, misconstrued by the ignorant, censured by the Church, abused with all the rancour of simulated virtue by the minions of a base despotism and the priests of a baser superstition. . . . The name of a man whose genius had illuminated all the dark places of policy, and to whose patriotic wisdom an oppressed people had owed their last chance of emancipation, passed into a proverb of infamy. . . . The terms in which he is commonly described would seem to import that he was the tempter, the evil principle, the discoverer of ambition and revenge, the original inventor of perjury," etc. "His History of Florence," says Hallam, "is enough to immortalize the name of Machiavel. Seldom has a more giant stride been made in any department of literature than by this judicious, clear, and elegant history." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.")

Macchietti, mâk-ke-et'tee, (GIROLAMO,) an Italian painter, surnamed DEL CROCIFISSAJO, (kro-che-fès-sâ'yo,) (because, as we are told, his master painted crucifixes,) was born at Florence about 1540. He worked at Florence and Rome, and painted history and portraits with great success. Among his master-pieces was a picture of the "Adoration of the Magi."

Mac-Clel'lan, (GEORGE,) M.D., an eminent American surgeon, born at Woodstock, Windham county, Connecticut, in 1796. He graduated at Yale College in 1815, and studied medicine in the University of Pennsylvania, where he took the degree of M.D. in 1819. He founded about 1826 the Jefferson Medical College in Philadelphia, in which he became professor of surgery and a very popular lecturer. He was one of the first in the United States to introduce the system of clinical instruction into the medical schools. He was particularly distinguished as a bold and successful surgical operator. Died in 1847.

MacClellan, (GEORGE BRINTON,) a distinguished American general, the son of the preceding, was born in Philadelphia, December 3, 1826. He entered the Military Academy at West Point in 1842, and graduated there in the summer of 1846, standing second in general rank in a large class. He served in the Mexican war as lieutenant of engineers in 1847, and was breveted captain for his services at the capture of Mexico. In the spring of 1855 the government sent to the seat of war in the Crimea a military commission to examine the military systems of the European powers, etc. Captain McClellan was one of the three officers selected for this mission. He returned home in April, 1856, and gave the results of his observations in a valuable report to the war department. He resigned his commission in the army in 1857, and was appointed chief engineer of the Illinois Central Railroad.

In May, 1861, he took command of the Union forces in Western Virginia, which defeated the enemy at Rich Mountain and Cheat River in July. A few days after the battle of Bull Run (July 21, 1861) he was, at the recommendation of General Scott, appointed commander of the army at Washington. He reorganized that army and brought it into a high state of discipline. When General Scott retired from active service, November 1, 1861, McClellan was appointed to the command of the armies of the United States. About the end of January, 1862, the President ordered that a general movement should be made by all the armies on the 22d of February. Having been relieved from the command of all the departments except that of the Potomac, McClellan began to move towards Richmond about the 10th of March. He conveyed his army by water down the Potomac and Chesapeake Bay to the mouth of James River. Soon after the opening of this campaign he began to complain that he was not properly supported by the President. He commenced active operations about the 5th of April, by the siege of Yorktown, which the insurgents evacuated on the 3d or 4th of May. On the next day he fought an indecisive battle at Williamsburg, from which he slowly followed the retiring enemy to the Chickahominy.

According to his biographer and admirer, Mr. Hillard, "the mind of McClellan was constantly burdened with a conviction that his troops were not numerous enough." He had about 95,000 men at Yorktown. The Union army was attacked at Fair Oaks on the 31st of May by General J. E. Johnston, who was repulsed with heavy loss. According to Hillard, McClellan was confined to bed by illness during this battle. His army remained nearly inactive in the swamps of the Chickahominy for about three weeks, during which he lost great numbers by sickness. Active hostilities were renewed by the enemy on the 26th of June, and then began the Seven Days' battles, at Mechanicsville, Savage's Station, White Oak Swamp, Gaines's Mill, and Malvern Hill, (July 1, 1862,) the result of which was that the Union army was compelled to retreat and abandon the conquest of Richmond. He wrote to Secretary Stanton, June 28, "If I save this army now, I tell you plainly that I owe no thanks to you or to any other persons in Washington. You have done your best to sacrifice this army." In July, 1862, he wrote the President a letter on the policy which ought, in his view, to be adopted in the conduct of the war. "Military power," he wrote, "should not be allowed to interfere with the relations of servitude. . . . A declaration of radical views, especially upon slavery, will rapidly disintegrate our present armies."

In August his army left the peninsula, and was moved by water from the James River to Aqui'a Creek About the 2d of September he was appointed general-in-chief of the army which had been commanded by Pope and had been driven back to Washington. General Lee, having crossed the Potomac into Maryland, was pursued by McClellan, who gained a victory at Antietam Creek on the 16th and 17th of September, 1862. The Union army lost in this battle 11,426 in killed and wounded, and was unprepared or unable to pursue Lee, who retired to Virginia on the 18th of September. On the 6th of October McClellan was ordered to cross the Potomac and give battle to the enemy or drive him south; but he delayed his advance for about three weeks, and was removed from command by an order dated the 5th of November and received on the 7th. In August, 1864, he was nominated as Democratic candidate for the Presidency by the Convention at Chicago. He received at the election only twenty-one electoral votes, cast by the States of Kentucky, Delaware, and New Jersey. He resigned his commission as major-general of the regular army, November 8, 1864, and made a long visit to Europe, from which he returned in 1868. He subsequently was appointed superintendent of docks and piers in the city of New York, a position which he resigned in 1872. In 1877 he was elected Governor of the State of New Jersey. Died October 29, 1885.

Mąc-Cler'nand, (JOHN A.,) an American general, born in Breckinridge county, Kentucky, in 1812. He removed to Illinois, and served as a member of Congress from that State from 1843 to 1861. He commanded a brigade at Fort Donelson, February, 1862, and a division at Shiloh, April 6 and 7 of that year. He succeeded General Sherman as commander of an army in Mississippi in January, 1863, and directed a corps at the siege of Vicksburg in May. He was removed from this command before the end of that siege.

Macclesfield, EARL OF. See PARKER.

Mąc-Clint'ọck, (Sir FRANCIS LEOPOLD,) a successful Arctic explorer, born at Dundalk, Ireland, in 1819. He entered the navy about 1831, and obtained the rank of lieutenant in 1845. In 1848 and 1849 he served under Sir James Ross in his expedition in search of Sir John Franklin. He distinguished himself by his enterprise, skill, and energy in several subsequent expeditions for the same purpose, and performed remarkable feats in sledge-travelling. In 1857 Captain McClintock received command of the "Fox" screw-steamer, fitted out by Lady Franklin for a final effort to obtain tidings of the lost navigator. In the winter of 1858–59 he and his officers performed extensive sledge-journeys, and in May found at Point Victory, on King William's Island, the record of Franklin's death and the remains of the last survivors of his party. (See FRANKLIN, Sir JOHN.) Soon after his return, September, 1859, he was knighted, and received various honours and rewards. He published a "Narrative of the Discovery of the Fate of Sir John Franklin," (1860.) He became vice-admiral in 1877.

Mąc-Clint'ọck, (JOHN,) D.D., an eminent American scholar and Methodist divine, born in Philadelphia in 1814, graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1835. He was professor of Greek and Latin in Dickinson College at Carlisle, became editor of the "Methodist Quarterly Review" in 1848, and conducted the same with great ability for eight years. In 1857 he was appointed pastor of Saint Paul's Church, in the city of New York, where he acquired distinction as a pulpit orator. He accepted in 1860 the charge of the American Chapel in Paris. During the civil war he rendered important services to the cause of the Union by his pen and voice, and his home in Paris became a rallying centre for patriotic Americans. Having returned home about 1865, he resumed his literary labours, and was selected in 1867 to organize the Drew Theological Seminary. His most important work, in which he was assisted by Dr. W. Strong, is a "Theological and Biblical Cyclopædia," in 10 vols., of which only three volumes were published before his death, which occurred March 4, 1870.

He was trained in the college and seminary at Emmittsburg, Maryland, was ordained a priest in 1834, and studied two years at Rome. In 1844 he was consecrated Bishop of Axiere and made coadjutor of the Bishop of New York. In 1847 he was installed Bishop of Albany, where his administration was brilliantly successful. In 1864 he was promoted to be Archbishop of New York, and in 1875 was created a cardinal-priest. Died in 1885.

MacCloskey, (WILLIAM GEORGE,) D.D., an American bishop, born in Brooklyn, New York, November 10, 1823. He graduated at the college in Emmittsburg, Maryland, in 1847, and became a professor in Saint Mary's Theological Seminary, (Roman Catholic,) was in 1859 appointed president of the American College in Rome, and in 1868 was consecrated Bishop of Louisville, Kentucky.

Mąc-Clure' or Maclure, (Sir ROBERT LE MESURIER,) a navigator, was born at Wexford, Ireland, in 1807. After serving many years in the navy, he accompanied Sir James Ross in search of Sir John Franklin in 1848. On his return, in 1849, he was raised to the rank of captain. In 1850, as captain of the Investigator, he was directed to renew the enterprise by advancing eastward from Behring's Strait. He entered a strait which he named the Prince of Wales Strait, and, after his ship was frozen fast, he pursued the exploration by sledges until he reached Melville or Barrow's Strait, in the winter of 1850–51. This is called the first discovery of the Northwest Passage. In the next season he discovered a second passage, on the north side of Baring Island. In 1853 he was extricated from a perilous situation by Captain Kellet, who arrived at Melville Island from the east; but he was forced to abandon the Investigator. On his return home he received a reward of £5000 for his discoveries. Died October 17, 1873.

Mac-Cor'mick, (CYRUS HALL,) an American inventor, born at Walnut Grove, in Rockbridge county, Virginia, February 11, 1809. He won great fame and wealth by his improved reaping-machines, the first of which was patented in 1834. In 1847 he became a resident of Chicago, where he died in 1884. He founded a Presbyterian theological seminary in that city in 1859.

Mac-Cosh', (JAMES,) D.D., an eminent Scottish writer on theology and metaphysics, was born in Ayrshire about 1810. He became a minister of the Free Church of Scotland, and about 1852 professor of logic at Belfast, Ireland. Among his works are "The Method of the Divine Government, Physical and Moral," (1850,) "The Intuitions of the Mind Inductively Investigated," (1860,) "The Supernatural in Relation to the Natural," (1862,) "Examination of Mr. J. S. Mill's Philosophy," (1866,) "Typical Forms and Special Ends in Creation," (in conjunction with Dr. Dickie,) (1869,) "Christianity and Positivism," (1871,) "The Scottish Philosophy, etc.," (1874,) "A Reply to Tyndall's Belfast Address," (1875,) and "The Emotions," (1880.) At the earnest invitation of the trustees and other friends of Princeton College, New Jersey, he held the office of president in that institution from 1868 to 1888, to the prosperity of which his name and influence gave a new impulse.

Maccovius. See MAKOWSKI.

Mac-Cŏwn', (JOHN PORTER,) an officer, born in Tennessee, served in the Mexican war in 1847, and became a brigadier-general in the Confederate army in 1861.

MacCrea, mȧk-krā', (JANE,) a daughter of a Scottish clergyman in New Jersey, was murdered in 1777 by the Indian allies of Burgoyne, near Fort Edward, on the Hudson.

MacCrie, mȧk-kree', (THOMAS,) an eloquent Scottish Presbyterian writer, born at Dunse, in Berwickshire, in 1772. He belonged to "the most straitest sect" of his religion, styled "Anti-Burghers," a part of the Secession Church. About 1795 he was ordained minister of a congregation in Edinburgh. In 1811 or 1812 he published a "Life of John Knox," which obtained great popularity. His "Life of Andrew Melville" (1819) displays, with warm sectarian partiality, much learning and ability. He afterwards produced, besides other works, an interesting "History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Italy," (1827.) Died in 1835. In reference to his "Life of Knox," Lord Jeffrey says, "We do not hesitate to pronounce it by far the best piece of history which has appeared since the commencement of our critical career. It is extremely accurate, learned, and concise, and at the same time very full of spirit and animation."

Macdonald, [Fr. pron. măk'do'năl',] (ÉTIENNE JACQUES JOSEPH,) Duke of Tarentum, an able French marshal, was born of a Scottish family at Sancerre in 1765. For his conduct at Jemmapes (1792) he was made a colonel. In 1793, as general of brigade, he served under Pichegru in Flanders. He was made a general of division in 1795 or 1796, and joined the army of Italy in 1797. In February, 1799, he succeeded Championnet in the chief command at Rome, where his operations were successful. He commanded at the great battle of Trebbia, (June, 1799,) where the superior numbers of the allied forces under Suwarow were victorious. In November, 1800, he led an army to Italy by the celebrated passage of the Splugen, which, says Alison, "was perhaps the most wonderful achievement of modern war." ("History of Europe.") He was sent as ambassador to Denmark in 1802, and returned in 1804. After this he passed about five years without employment, having, it is supposed, offended Bonaparte by his public expressions in favour of Moreau. Having received command of a division in 1809, he displayed great skill and courage at Wagram, (July, 1809,) where Bonaparte gave him a marshal's bâton on the field of battle. Soon after this event he was created Duke of Tarentum. In the Russian campaign of 1812, Marshal Macdonald commanded the tenth corps. He contributed to the victories of Lutzen and Bautzen, (1813,) and served the emperor with fidelity to the last in the campaign of 1814. When Napoleon was about to abdicate, he expressed his grateful sense of Macdonald's services, and presented to him a Turkish sabre. Having declared his adhesion to Louis XVIII., he refused to serve his former master during the Hundred Days, and in 1816 was appointed grand chancellor of the legion of honour, and commander of a military division. He died in 1840, leaving his title of duke to an only son.

Mackinnon, (HENRY,) a British general, born near Winchester in 1773. He served many campaigns against the French. He distinguished himself in several actions in Spain, obtained command of a brigade in 1809, and was killed at Ciudad Rodrigo in 1812.

Mack'in-tosh, (Sir JAMES,) an illustrious British author, orator, and statesman, was born at Aldourie, near Inverness, on the 24th of October, 1765. He was the son of Captain John Mackintosh, of the army, and Marjory Macgillivray. At King's College, Aberdeen, which he entered in 1780, he profited by the congenial society of Robert Hall, who was his fellow-student and intimate friend. He studied medicine in Edinburgh, and, having obtained his diploma, in 1788 removed to London, where he married Catherine Stuart in 1789. His fluent elocution, admirable temper, and refined manners procured his admission into the best society. He had a "boundless literary ambition," and a most capacious and accurate memory. In defence, or rather ardent eulogy, of the first reforms of the French Revolution, he produced, in answer to Burke's famous "Reflections," his "Vindiciæ Gallicæ," (1791,) which raised him into sudden celebrity and caused him to be warmly caressed by Fox, Sheridan, and other chiefs of the Whig party. About this time he renounced medicine and became a student of law. He was called to the bar in 1795, gave special attention to public law, and practised with success in the home circuit. In 1799 he delivered a series of lectures "On the Law of Nature and of Nations," which were highly applauded by the most eminent judges of all parties as a noble monument of intellectual power and wisdom. He expressed in these lectures more conservative views than those of his "Vindiciæ Gallicæ." In 1803 he gained a high reputation for forensic eloquence by his defence of M. Peltier, a French emigrant, who was tried for a libel on Bonaparte, and was acquitted. This speech was translated into French by Madame de Staël. He accepted the office of recorder of Bombay, where he arrived in 1804, and was appointed judge of the admiralty court in 1806. Sir James returned to England in 1812, and was elected to Parliament by the Whigs in 1813. He won and maintained a high place among parliamentary speakers. From 1818 to 1824 he was professor of law and politics in the college at Haileybury. He contributed to the "Edinburgh Review," and wrote an important "Dissertation on the Progress of Ethical Philosophy," which appeared among the preliminary essays of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." In 1830 he accepted office as commissioner for the affairs of India under the ministry of Earl Gray. He made a powerful and luminous speech in the House on the Reform bill in 1831. He wrote a "History of England," a work of great merit, which was published in "Lardner's Cyclopædia," (1831.) He died in May, 1832, leaving unfinished a "History of the Revolution in England in 1688," which was published in 1832. "We have no hesitation," says Macaulay, "in pronouncing this fragment decidedly the best history now extant of the reign of James II. . . . The intellectual and moral qualities which are most important in a historian, he possessed in a very high degree. He was singularly mild, calm, and impartial in his judgments of men and of parties." The same critic adds, "He distinguished himself highly in Parliament. But nevertheless Parliament was not exactly the sphere for him. The effect of his most successful speeches was small, when compared with the quantity of ability and learning which was expended on them."

"It would be difficult," says Mr. Whipple, "to mention any writer whose name has been connected with the literary journals of the nineteenth century, who has carried into the task of criticism so much fairness and moderation as Mackintosh. His nature was singularly free from asperity and dogmatism. To a large understanding and boundless stores of knowledge he united candour and even humility in their employment. . . . The beauty of his character will long continue to exert an influence in insensibly moulding the minds of scholars and statesmen." Mąc-lăr'ęn, (CHARLES,) a Scottish journalist and geologist, born about 1783. He was chief editor of the "Scotsman" (a leading political journal of Edinburgh) from 1820 to 1847. He published, besides other works, "The Geology of Fife and the Lothians," (1839.) Died in September, 1866.

Mąc-Lăr'ęn, (WILLIAM EDWARD,) D.D., an American bishop, born in Geneva, New York, December 13, 1831, graduated in 1851 from the college at Washington, Pennsylvania, was a journalist, 1852–57, studied theology in the Presbyterian Seminary at Pittsburg, and became a Presbyterian clergyman. In 1872 he took orders in the Episcopal Church, and in 1875 he was made Bishop of Illinois.

Mąc-lau'rin, (COLIN,) an eminent Scottish mathematician, born at Kilmodan in 1698. He obtained the chair of mathematics in Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1717. In 1720 he published "Geometria Organica sive Descriptio Linearum Curvarum universalis," a treatise on curve lines, which is said to have excited the admiration of Newton. In 1725 he was appointed assistant of Professor Gregory in the University of Edinburgh, where he remained about twenty years. While he was employed in fortifying Edinburgh against the Pretender's army, in 1745, he contracted a disease which hastened his death. He shared with D. Bernoulli and Euler the prize awarded in 1740 by the Academy of Paris for a memoir on Tides. He was the author of several original and profound works, among which are a "Treatise on Fluxions," (1742,) and a "Treatise on Algebra," (1748.) Died in 1746.

Mąc-lay', (ARCHIBALD,) D.D., a Baptist divine, born in Scotland in 1778, emigrated to America in 1805, and became pastor of a church in New York. He was thirteen years general agent of the American and Foreign Bible Society. Died in 1860.

Maclay, (MICKLUCHO.) See MICKLUCHO-MACLAY.

MacLean or Maclean, mąk-lān', (JOHN,) an American statesman and jurist, born in Morris county, New Jersey, in March, 1785. He removed with his father to Ohio about 1798, was admitted to the bar in 1807, and began to practise at Lebanon. In 1812 he was elected a member of Congress, in which he acted with the Democrats, and supported the war against England. He was again elected by a unanimous vote in 1814, was a judge of the supreme court of Ohio from 1816 to 1822, and became postmaster-general in 1823. He filled this office with great credit and ability until March, 1829, during which period he introduced many improvements and brought the department into a state of the highest efficiency. He declined a place in the cabinet of President Jackson, and was appointed a judge of the supreme court of the United States in 1829. He dissented from the decision of the court in the Dred Scott case, as given by Chief-Justice Taney in 1857, and opposed the extension of slavery. At the Republican National Convention of 1856 he received one hundred and ninety-six votes as a candidate for the Presidency of the United States. Died in Cincinnati in April, 1861.

Maclise, mąk-leess', (DANIEL,) a popular historical painter, born at Cork, Ireland, in 1811. He went to London in 1828, and became a student in the Royal Academy, where he quickly won several prize medals. He gained a high reputation by his "Vow of the Ladies and the Peacock," (1835,) and "Merry Christmas in the Baron's Hall," (1838.) In 1840 he was elected an Academician. Among his admired productions are "The Sleeping Beauty," (1841,) "The Play Scene in Hamlet," (1842,) "Noah's Sacrifice," (1847,) and "Shakspeare's Seven Ages," (1848.) He is regarded as one of the most original of English painters of the present time. Died in April, 1870.

Maclure. See MACCLURE.

Mąc-lure', (WILLIAM,) an eminent naturalist, and pioneer of American geology, born at Ayr, in Scotland, in 1763. Having made an extensive scientific tour in Europe, he removed to the United States, and about 1806 entered upon a geological survey of that country. In the accomplishment of this task, he visited nearly every State and Territory in the Union, and crossed and recrossed the Alleghanies fifty times. An account of his tour was published in the "Transactions of the American Philosophical Society," (1809.) In 1812 Mr. Maclure became one of the first members of the Academy of Natural Sciences just founded at Philadelphia, and was elected president of that institution in 1817. He continued to fill this post for twenty-two years, and the "Journal" of the Academy was begun under his auspices. His donations of books to the Academy amounted to nearly fifteen hundred volumes, comprising valuable works on natural history, antiquities, etc., and he gave the sum of $20,000 towards the erection of the building on Broad Street, finished in 1840. Died in 1840, at San Angel, in Mexico, whither he had gone on account of his health.

See "Memoirs of Wm. Maclure," by SAMUEL G. MORTON.

MacMahon, măk'mȧ'ôn', (MARIE EDME PATRICK MAURICE,) Duc de Magenta, a French marshal, of Irish extraction, born in 1808, was a son of a peer of France. He served in Algeria from 1830 to 1850. In 1852 he became a general of division. In the siege of Sebastopol he commanded the division which took the Malakoff by assault on the 8th of September, 1855. He commanded the second corps-d'armée in the Italian campaign of 1859, and took a prominent part in the battle of Magenta. This service was rewarded (June 5, 1859) by the rank of marshal of France and the title of Duc de Magenta. He also contributed to the victory of Solferino, June 24, 1859. In the war with Prussia he was defeated at Wörth (August 6, 1870) and at Sedan, (September 1,) where he was severely wounded. He put down the revolution of the Commune in 1871, and was President of France, 1873–79.

Mąc-Mas'ter, (GUY HUMPHREYS,) an American poet, born at Clyde, New York, January 31, 1829. He graduated at Hamilton College in 1847, and became a lawyer. He was county judge of Steuben county, New York, from 1864 to 1871, and from 1878 to 1884. In 1884 he was made surrogate of the same county. He wrote "Carmen Bellicosum," etc. Died September 13, 1887.

MacMaster, (JOHN BACH,) an American author, born in Brooklyn, New York, June 29, 1852. He graduated at the College of the City of New York in 1872, and studied civil engineering. He was an instructor first in his alma mater and then in Princeton College, and in 1883 was chosen professor of history in the University of Pennsylvania. He is the author of a "History of the People of the United States," (vol. i., 1883.)

MacMichael, mąk-mī'kęl, (MORTON,) an able American editor and orator, born in Burlington county, New Jersey, in 1807, was sheriff of the county of Philadelphia from 1843 to 1846. In 1845 he became proprietor and chief editor of the "North American and United States Gazette." He was mayor of Philadelphia from 1865 to 1868. Died January 6, 1879.

MacMichael, mąk-mī'kęl, (WILLIAM,) an English physician, born in 1784. He published a "Journey from Moscow to Constantinople," (1819.) Died in 1839.

Mąc-mil'lạn, (HUGH,) D.D., LL.D., a Scottish divine, born at Aberfeldy, September 17, 1833. He was educated at the Edinburgh University, and became a distinguished Free Church minister. He published "Bible Teachings in Nature," (1866,) "First Forms of Vegetation," "Holidays on High Lands," "The True Vine," and many other popular religious books.

Mąc-Mul'lęn, (JOHN,) D.D., a bishop, born at Ballynahinch, Ireland, March 8, 1833. He was taken in 1837 to Canada, and in 1843 to Chicago, graduated at Saint Mary's College in 1853, studied at Rome, and was ordained in 1858 to the Catholic priesthood. He became president of Saint Mary's University, and in 1881 was made Bishop of Davenport, Iowa. Died July 4, 1883.

Mac-Nab', (Sir ALLAN,) an officer in the British service, born in Canada in 1798. He studied law, and was elected to the legislature of Canada West. During the insurrection of 1837 he commanded near Niagara, and sent over the falls the steamboat Caroline, which had been captured from the insurgents. He was the principal minister during part of the period in which Lord Elgin governed Canada, (1846–54.) He was knighted for his services in the rebellion above mentioned. Died in Canada in August, 1862.

See D. MOIR, "Life of R. Macnish," prefixed to a collection of his "Tales, Essays, and Sketches," 1839 and 1844; CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen," (Supplement;) "Fraser's Magazine" for December, 1835, (with a portrait.)

Macomb, mą-koom' or mą-kōm', (ALEXANDER,) a distinguished American general, born at Detroit in 1782. He served in the war of 1812, and, as brigadier-general, in 1814, gained the victory of Plattsburg over the British at the same time that Commodore Macdonough signally defeated them on the lake. General Macomb was appointed in 1835 commander-in-chief of the United States army. Died in 1841.

See the "National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans," vol. i.

Macomb, (WILLIAM H.,) an American commodore, a son of General Alexander Macomb, was born in Michigan in 1820. He entered the navy in 1834, served with distinction through the war of 1861–65 with the rank of commander, and was made a commodore in 1870. Died at Philadelphia, August 12, 1872.

Mā'cọn, (NATHANIEL,) an American statesman, born in Warren county, North Carolina, in 1757. He served as a private in the army from 1778 to 1782, and opposed the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, (1788.) In 1791 he was elected a member of Congress for a district of North Carolina, which he represented until 1815. He was always a Democrat, and a strict-constructionist. He was Speaker of the National House of Representatives for three terms, (1801–06,) and became a Senator of the United States in 1816. His speeches were short, but effective. He served in the Senate until 1826, having then been a member of Congress for thirty-seven consecutive years. He died in Warren county, North Carolina, in June, 1837. John Randolph called him "the best and wisest man that I ever knew."

Mąc-Os'cąr, (WILLIAM,) a Scottish minor poet, born at Lochwinnoch, May 7, 1806. He was a schoolmaster, and lived many years in London. Died at Kilbarchan, January 11, 1877. His "Poetical Works" were published in 1878.

Mąc-Phęr'sọn, (EDWARD,) LL.D., an American author, was born at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, July 31, 1830. He graduated at Pennsylvania College in 1848, and became a journalist. He was in Congress from 1859 to 1863, and was clerk of the lower house of Congress, 1863–69. He published a "Political History of the United States," (1864,) a "Political Manual," and other works.

Mąc-phęr'sọn, (JAMES,) a Scottish poet, celebrated as the translator or author of "Ossian," was born in Inverness-shire in 1738. After leaving college he became a school-teacher at Ruthven, and in 1758 published "The Highlander," a poem, which was not successful. In 1760 he surprised the literary world by the publication of "Fragments of Ancient Poetry collected in the Highlands of Scotland, and translated from the Gaelic or Erse Language." These were admired by the poet Gray and others, and a subscription was raised to aid Macpherson in exploring the Highlands for other similar treasures. The ostensible result of this search appeared in "Fingal, an Epic Poem," (1762,) and "Temora, an Epic Poem," (1763,) which purported to be the work of Ossian, a poet of the third century. These poems found many enthusiastic admirers throughout Europe. An animated controversy ensued about their authenticity, which was defended by Dr. Blair and other eminent critics. Dr. Johnson, on the other hand, confidently maintained that they were forgeries. Many others adopt the theory that he caught the spirit of the Ossianic poetry from the tales of the old Celtic bards, but supplied from his own invention much of the peculiar imagery and cloudy verbiage which abound in his pretended translations. About 1772 he settled in London, and produced a prose version of the "Iliad," which was a failure, a "History of Great Britain," and other works. He was a member of Parliament from 1780 to 1790. Died in 1796.

Mąc-Phęr'sọn, (JAMES BIRDSEYE,) an eminent American general, born in Sandusky county, Ohio, in November, 1828. He entered the Military Academy of West Point in 1849, and graduated at the head of his class in 1853. Having been assigned to the corps of engineers, he was employed as engineer at New York, Fort Delaware, and Alcatraz Island, California. He obtained the rank of first lieutenant in 1858, and that of captain in August, 1861. In November ensuing he became aide-de-camp to General Halleck, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He served as chief engineer on General Grant's staff at the capture of Fort Donelson, and at the battle of Shiloh, April 6 and 7, 1862. In May of that year he was appointed a colonel in the regular army, and brigadier-general of volunteers. He commanded a division which broke through the lines of General Price, then investing Corinth, and marched in to the relief of the garrison in October. For this service he was promoted to the rank of major-general on the 8th of October, 1862. Having obtained command of the seventeenth army corps in December, he served under General Grant in the campaign against Vicksburg. His corps gained a victory at Raymond on the 12th of May, 1863, and, with the aid of General Sherman's corps, defeated General Joseph E. Johnston at Jackson on the 14th. General McPherson contributed to the victory of Champion's Hills, and took part in two unsuccessful assaults on the works of Vicksburg in May. For his services in this campaign he was promoted to be a brigadier-general in the regular army, to date from the capture of Vicksburg, and was appointed commander of the district of Vicksburg, July, 1863. He served under Sherman in the expedition to Meridian in February, 1864. In the next month, General Grant, who had just been nominated general-in-chief of all the Union armies, wrote a letter to Sherman, in which he expressed his thanks to Sherman and McPherson as the men to whom he was most indebted for his success. On the 12th of March, McPherson was appointed commander of the department and army of the Tennessee.

As commander of the army of the Tennessee, he maintained his high reputation in the campaign which Sherman conducted in Georgia. His army fought with success against the rebels at Dallas on the 28th of May. On the 27th of June, Generals Thomas and McPherson assaulted the fortified lines of Kenesaw Mountain, but were repulsed with severe loss. By a flank movement of the army of McPherson, General Johnston was induced to abandon his strong position at Kenesaw about July 3, and to retreat to Atlanta. After the Union armies had advanced to the vicinity of Atlanta, the enemy adopted a bolder policy, and made several attacks, in one of which McPherson was killed, July 22, 1864. "About 1 P.M. of this day," says General Grant, "the brave, accomplished, and noble-hearted McPherson was killed." (Report, dated July 22, 1865.)

See TENNEY, "Military History of the Rebellion."

Macpherson, (Sir JOHN,) born in Skye, Scotland, about 1767, became a member of the supreme council of Bengal in 1781. He acted as Governor-General of India after the retirement of Warren Hastings, (February, 1785,) until July, 1786. Died in 1821.

Macquarie, mą-kwŏr're, (LACHLAN,) a British general, born in the island of Mull in 1762. He served many years in India, and fought against the French in Egypt in 1801. From 1809 to 1821 he was Governor of New South Wales. About 1814 he obtained the rank of general. Died in 1824.

Macquart, mȧ'kȧR', (LOUIS CHARLES HENRI,) a French mineralogist, born at Rheims in 1745. He published a "Manual of the Properties of Water," (1783,) and a "Dictionary of Health and Education," (2 vols., 1800.) Died in 1808.

Macquer, mȧ'kair', (PHILIPPE,) a French littérateur and advocate, born in Paris in 1720. He was author of a "Chronological Abridgment of Ecclesiastical History," (2 vols., 1751,) "Roman Annals," (1756,) and an "Abridged History of Spain and Portugal," (2 vols., 1759,) (all in French,) which were received with favour. Died in 1770.

See QUÉRARD, "La France Littéraire."

Macquer, (PIERRE JOSEPH,) a meritorious French chemist and physician, born in Paris in 1718, was a brother of the preceding. He discovered new properties in many chemical substances, and is said to have been the first who proved that the diamond is combustible, (1771.) He published "Elements of Theoretical Chemistry," (1741,) and a valuable "Dictionary of Chemistry," (1766.) In 1745 he was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences. He succeeded Bourdelin as professor of chemistry at the Jardin du Roi, and edited the scientific department of the "Journal des Savants" from 1768 to 1776. Died in 1784.

Mąc-quoid', (KATHARINE S.,) an English authoress, born in Kentish Town, London, about 1835. Among her works are many novels ("A Bad Beginning," (1862,) "Hester Kirton," "Patty," (1871,) "Doris Barugh," (1878,) "Beside the River," "Fifine," etc.,) and some books of travel, such as "Through Normandy," "Through Brittany," "In the Ardennes," etc. Some of her works have been illustrated by her husband, Mr. Thomas R. Macquoid.

Macready, mą-kree'de, (WILLIAM CHARLES,) a popular English tragic actor, born in London in 1793. He made a successful début at Birmingham in 1810, and appeared on the London stage in 1816, when he performed "Orestes" at Covent Garden with great applause. His reputation was increased by his performance of the "Virginius" of Sheridan Knowles, and of "Richard III." and other leading characters of Shakspeare. From 1837 to 1839 he was lessee and manager of Covent Garden Theatre. About 1842 he assumed the management of Drury Lane; but, as he failed to make it profitable, he kept it only two or three seasons. He performed with great success in the principal cities of the United States in 1848 and 1849. While he was in this country, a quarrel between him and Edwin Forrest resulted in a serious riot in New York. He retired from the stage in 1851. Died April 27, 1873.

Madier de Montjau, mą̃′de-ȧ′ dęh mȯ̃N′zhō′, (PAULIN,) a French advocate and judge, born at Bourg-Saint-Andéol in 1785. He showed firmness and sagacity in the repression of the excesses committed by the royalists about 1816–20. Died May 10, 1865.

Mad′ĭ-sọn, (JAMES,) D.D., an American prelate, born in Rockingham county, Virginia, in 1749, became Episcopal Bishop of Virginia in 1790. He had been previously elected president of William and Mary College. Died in 1812.

Madison, (JAMES,) an eminent American statesman, he fourth President of the United States, born in King George county, Virginia, on the 16th of March, 1751, was a son of Colonel James Madison and Eleanor or Nelly Conway. He entered Princeton College, New Jersey, in 1769, and graduated in 1771, after which he studied law. In 1776 he was elected a member of the Assembly or Convention of Virginia. He was defeated in the election of 1777 because he refused to "treat" the voters; but he was elected a member of the General Congress by the Assembly of Virginia in 1779. From this period he was one of the most prominent men in the political history of the republic. He was re-elected in 1786, and was a member of the National Convention which met at Philadelphia in 1787 to form the Constitution of the United States. He took a prominent part in the debates on the Constitution, and advocated the adoption of the same by a series of able essays, forming part of "The Federalist," which is the joint production of Hamilton, Madison, and Jay. Madison was a member of the Virginia Convention which, after a spirited contest, adopted the Federal Constitution by a small majority in June, 1788. He became a member of Congress in 1789, and united with the Republicans as a moderate opponent of the administration of Washington and the financial measures of Hamilton. He was disposed to be a mediator rather than a partisan in the dissensions which arose among the founders of the republic. In 1794 he married Dorothy Todd, originally Dorothy Paine, a woman eminent for her virtues and accomplishments. He declined the office of secretary of state vacated by Jefferson in December, 1793, and continued to serve in Congress until 1797. He opposed the alien and sedition laws of 1798, and was the author of a series of resolutions adopted by the Assembly of Virginia and known as the Resolutions of 1798, which protested against all attempts to increase the power of the Federal government by forced constructions of general clauses of the Constitution. He was appointed secretary of state by President Jefferson in March, 1801, and filled that office for eight years in such a manner as to acquire the confidence and approbation of the people. Having been nominated for the Presidency by a caucus of Republican members of Congress, he was elected in 1808, receiving one hundred and twenty-two electoral votes out of one hundred and seventy-five, which was the whole number. Charles C. Pinckney, the Federal candidate, received forty-seven votes. On entering upon the office of President, March 4, 1809, he found the United States involved in difficulties and disputes with the British government, which had offended the Americans by impressing seamen and by searching American vessels for deserters, and had injured their commerce by orders in council. His cabinet at first consisted of Robert Smith, secretary of state, Albert Gallatin, secretary of the treasury, William Eustis, secretary of war, and Paul Hamilton, secretary of the navy.

In May, 1810, Congress passed a non-intercourse act. The President sent to Congress a special message on the subject of British aggressions about the 1st of June, 1812, and war was declared on the 18th of the same month. A few days later the British ministry repealed their orders in council in relation to the rights of neutrals, but they refused to satisfy the Americans in relation to the impressment of seamen. In the autumn of 1812 Mr. Madison was re-elected to the Presidency by one hundred and twenty-eight electoral votes. His competitor was De Witt Clinton, who received eighty-nine votes. The slave States, with Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Vermont, voted for Madison. A strong party in the United States was opposed to the war of 1812, which was waged with various success on land and sea. Commodore Perry gained a naval victory on Lake Erie in September, 1813. About the 3d of July, 1814, a small American army invaded Canada, gained a victory at Chippewa, and fought a severe battle at Lundy's Lane, or Niagara, (July 25,) in which the Americans lost 743 killed and wounded and the British lost 878. In August of that year a small British force ascended the Chesapeake, took Washington by a sudden movement, and burned the Capitol. A treaty of peace was signed at Ghent, December 24, 1814; but, before the tidings of this event had reached the United States, General Jackson gained a signal victory over the British at New Orleans, January 8, 1815. In 1816 Madison approved a bill which Congress had passed to charter the Bank of the United States for twenty years. On the 4th of March, 1817, he retired from public life. He passed the remainder of his days on his farm at Montpelier, Orange county, Virginia. He was a member of the Virginia Convention called in 1829 to revise the Constitution of the State. Died at Montpelier, June 28, 1836.

"This great statesman and philosopher," says R. W. Griswold, "was the confidential, personal, and political friend of Jefferson; but in almost every respect their characters were essentially different. Mr. Madison's intellect was of a far higher order, and its ascendency over his passions was nearly perfect. His triumphs were those of pure reason. His public and private life were above reproach. . . . His writings on the Constitution and other subjects were second only to those of Hamilton in ability and influence; and his extensive information, sound judgment, skill as a logician, and unvarying courtesy, secured him the highest consideration in the Congresses of which he was a member." ("Prose Writers of America.") He left in manuscript "Reports of the Debates in the National Convention of 1788," which were purchased by Congress after his death, and published in 3 vols., (1840.) This is a work of great value to students of political philosophy.

Mad'oc or Madog, the second son of Owen Gwynedd, Prince of Wales, lived in the twelfth century. Some writers favour the hypothesis that he discovered America about 1170, at which period he was compelled to leave Wales by a successful rebellion against his dynasty. Tradition informs us that he sailed from Wales on a second expedition to the newly-discovered shores, and was never heard from after. His history furnishes the subject of Southey's poem entitled "Madoc."

Mad'ox, (Thomas,) an eminent English antiquary, was an inmate of the Middle Temple, London, and was called to the bar about 1704. He was a diligent collector of old legal and historical records, and obtained the title of royal historiographer. His principal work is "The History and Antiquities of the Exchequer of the Kings of England from the Norman Conquest to the End of the Reign of Edward II.," (1711.) He also published "Firma Burgi; or, A Historical Essay concerning the Cities, Towns, and Boroughs of England," (1726.) Died about 1735.

See Nichols and Bowyer, "Literary Anecdotes."

Madoz, mȧ-dōth', (Pascual,) a Spanish author and liberal statesman, was born at Pampeluna in 1806. He chose the profession of the law, and was appointed a judge at Barcelona in 1835. He edited a "Universal Geographical Dictionary," (1831–34,)—a work of decided merit. Having been elected a deputy to the Cortes, he removed to Madrid, where he devoted much time to an arduous and successful enterprise, as editor of a voluminous "Geographical-Historical Dictionary of Spain," (1848,) which is, perhaps, the most complete and excellent work of the kind ever published. Madoz became a leader of the party called Progresistas, and was minister of finance for about four months in 1855. Died December 11, 1870.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Madrazo, de, dȧ mȧ-drȧ'tho, (Don Federico,) a Spanish painter, a son of the following, was born at Rome in 1815. He painted portraits with success, and became court painter at Madrid. He gained a medal of the first class in 1855.

Madrazo y Agudo, de, dȧ mȧ-drȧ'tho e ȧ-goo'do, (Don José,) a Spanish painter of history and portraits, born at Santander in 1781. He became court painter to Ferdinand VII., and director of the Academy of Madrid. Died in 1859.

Madrid, de, dȧ mȧd-rĕd', (José Fernandez,) born at Carthagena, South America, in 1789. He was chosen president of the republic of New Granada in 1816, but in the same year was made prisoner by the Spaniards. After an imprisonment of nine years in Havana, he escaped in 1825, after which he was employed by Bolivar as secret agent in Paris. He wrote "Atala," a tragedy. Died in 1830.

Madrolle, mȧ'drol', (Antoine,) a French writer on religion and politics, born at Saint-Seine in 1792. He published numerous works, in which he advocated ultramontane doctrines. Died in 1861.

Madvig, mȧd'vig, (Johann or Jens Nikolai,) a Danish philologist, born in the isle of Bornholm in 1804. He was appointed minister of public instruction in 1848. Among his works are "Opuscula Academica," 2 vols., (1834–42,) a noted "Latin Grammar," (1841,) and editions of Latin authors. Died in 1886.

Mæcenas, mē-see'nas, [It. Mecenate, mȧ-chȧ-nȧ'tȧ, or Mecenato; Fr. Mécène, mȧ'sȧn',] (Caius Cilnius,) a celebrated patron of literature at Rome, was born probably about 70 B.C. He was descended from an ancient and royal Etruscan family, and belonged to the equestrian order. (Horace, Carm. I. 1–20.) He was the friend of Octavius before his accession as the emperor Augustus. His fidelity and talents having been approved in many important negotiations, Octavius intrusted to him the administration of Rome during his absence in 36 B.C. when he went to war against Sextus Pompeius. After the battle of Actium (31 A.D.) had rendered Octavius master of Rome, he is said to have followed the counsel of Mæcenas in founding an empire instead of restoring the republic. Agrippa and Mæcenas were the favourites and chief ministers of Augustus for many years. The political career of the latter ended about 16 B.C. Mæcenas was versed in Greek and Roman literature, and rendered his name memorable by his liberal patronage of Horace, Virgil, and other poets, who were his intimate friends. His name had become proverbial as a patron of letters as early as the time of Martial. It is said that Virgil's "Georgics" was written at the request of Mæcenas. In the councils of state he advocated mild and liberal measures and the free expression of opinions. He wrote several mediocre works, of which only small fragments are extant. Died in 8 B.C.

Mævius, mee've-us, an obscure Roman poetaster of the Augustan age, acquired notoriety by his envious attacks on the best poets of his time. His name has been saved from oblivion by the ridicule of Virgil, who mentions him in his Third Eclogue. The name of Gifford's satiric poem "The Mæviad" is derived from Mævius.

Maffei, mȧf-fā'ee, (ANDREA,) an Italian poet, born at Riva di Trento in 1802. He published several volumes of original verse, but is chiefly known for his excellent translations from other literatures, mainly English and German. Died in 1885.

Maffei, mȧf-fā'ee, (BERNARDINO,) an Italian cardinal, born in 1513, wrote a "Commentary on Cicero's Epistles." Died at Rome in 1553.

Maffei, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian painter, born at Vicenza. He imitated Paul Veronese in colouring. His style is grand, but rather exaggerated. Died about 1660.

Maffei, (FRANCESCO SCIPIONE,) MARQUIS, a celebrated Italian scholar and author, born at Verona in June, 1675. He made a campaign in the service of Bavaria, and distinguished himself at Donauwerth in 1704, but soon renounced the military profession and devoted himself to literature. In 1713 he produced "Merope," a tragedy, which was highly applauded, and ran through seventy editions in forty years. His principal work, "Verona Illustrata," (2 vols. fol., 1731,) treats of the origin, history, and literary history of Verona. It is admirable for profound research, sound criticism, and elegant style. He also wrote "Introduction to the Science of Diplomatics," ("Istoria diplomatica che serve d'Introduzione all' Arte critica in tal Materia,") and other works. He was a member of the Royal Societies of London and of Berlin. Died in 1755.

Maffeo (or Maffei) Vegio, mȧf-fā'o vā'jo, [Lat. MAPHÆ'US VE'GIUS,] one of the most eminent Latin poets of the fifteenth century, was born at Lodi in 1406. He became a resident of Rome, and was appointed secretary of briefs and datary by Eugene IV. Besides several religious works in prose, he composed Latin poems, entitled "The Golden Fleece," ("Astyanax Vellus Aureum,") and "Æneidos Supplementum," (1471,) a continuation of Virgil's great epic. The last was the most admired of his works. He was highly praised by Scaliger. Died in 1458.

Magalhaens. See MAGELLAN.

Magalhaens, mȧ-gȧl-yȧ'ĕns, (GABRIEL,) a Portuguese missionary, born near Coimbra in 1609, laboured in the Jesuit missions in China from 1640 until his death, in 1677, and wrote a "Description of China," (1688.)

Magalhaens de Gandavo, de, dȧ mȧ-gȧl-yȧ'ĕns dȧ gȧn-dȧ'vo, (PEDRO,) a Portuguese historian, born at Braga about 1550. He passed some years in Brazil, and published at Lisbon in 1576 a "History of Brazil," a work of some merit.

Magalon, mȧ'gȧ'lôN', (JEAN DENIS,) a French writer and journalist, born at Bagnoles in 1794; died about 1840.

Magalotti, mȧ-gȧ-lot'tee, (LORENZO,) COUNT, an Italian philosopher, born at Rome in 1637, was versed in ancient and modern languages. He became a resident of Florence, the grand duke of which employed him on diplomatic missions to Vienna and Mantua. Among his works are a treatise against atheism, called "Familiar Letters," (1719,) "Scientific and Learned Letters," ("Lettere scientifiche ed erudite," 1721,) and "Anacreontic Songs," (1723.) "The Letters of Magalotti and of Redi," says Hallam, "seem to do more credit than anything else to this period," (of Italian literature.) Died in 1712.

Maganza, mȧ-gȧn'zȧ, (ALESSANDRO,) an Italian historical painter, born at Vicenza in 1556. He imitated Paul Veronese with moderate success. Died in 1630. Alessandro had three sons, who were promising artists; but they died prematurely before their father.

See A. M. MENEGHELLI, "Elogio di A. Maganza," 1845; LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy."

Maganza, (GIOVANNI BATTISTA,) an Italian painter, surnamed IL MAGAGNO, (ēl mȧ-gȧn'yo,) born at Vicenza in 1509, was the father of the preceding. He was a pupil of Titian, and was successful in portraits and history. He was author of a volume of poems, ("Rime,") published in 1570. Died in 1589.

See LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy;" BALDINUCCI, "Notizie."

Maganza, (GIOVANNI BATTISTA,) a painter of the Venetian school, born at Vicenza in 1577, was a son and pupil of Alessandro, noticed above. Died in 1617.

Mā'gas, [Gr. Μάγας,] a king of Cyrene, and a stepson of Ptolemy Soter. Died in 258 B.C.

Magati, mȧ-gȧ'tee, or Magatti, mȧ-gȧt'tee, [Lat. MAGA'TUS,] (CESARE,) an eminent Italian surgical writer, born at Scandiano in 1579. He wrote "De rara Medicatione Vulnerum," (1616.) Died in 1647.

Magatus. See MAGATI.

Mag'dą-lene or Mag'dą-len, [Fr. MADELEINE or MADELÈNE, mȧd'lȧn',] (MARY,) an eminent Christian saint, was probably born at Magdala, in Galilee. She was one of the personal followers of Christ, by whom she was "healed of evil spirits and infirmities." (See Luke viii. 2.) Nothing appears to be known of her history in addition to the facts narrated by the four Evangelists. (See Matthew xxvii. and xxviii., Mark xvi., and John xix. 25 and xx. 1–18.) The learned differ on the question of her identity with Mary the sister of Lazarus of Bethany. The prevalent notion that her morals were very depraved before her conversion appears to have no real foundation.

Mą-gēe', (WILLIAM,) Archbishop of Dublin, was born in Ireland in 1765. He opposed Unitarianism in "Discourses on the Scriptural Doctrines of the Atonement," (2 vols., 1801,) which procured for him a wide reputation. He became Bishop of Raphoe in 1819, and Archbishop of Dublin in 1822. Died in 1831.

Magee, (WILLIAM CONNOR,) D.D., a prelate, a grandson of the preceding, was born at Cork, December 17, 1821. He was educated at Kilkenny College, and at Trinity College, Dublin. In 1864 he was made Dean of Cork, and soon after dean of the Chapel Royal, Dublin. In 1868 he was consecrated Bishop of Peterborough, (Anglican,) and in 1891 became Archbishop of York. Died May 5, 1891.

Magellan, mȧ-jel'ląn, [Sp. pron. mȧ-hēl-yȧn'; Port. MAGALHAENS, mȧ-gȧl-yȧ'ĕns,] (FERNANDO,) a Portuguese navigator, distinguished for his skill, enterprise, and important discoveries, was born about 1470. He served several years in the East Indies under Albuquerque, and took part in the capture of Malacca in 1511. A few years later he offered his services to Charles V., and received command of a fleet of five vessels and 230 men. With these he sailed, September, 1519, with a view to find a western route to the East Indies. He passed the winter of 1520 (from May to September) in the Bay of Saint Julian, about 49° south latitude, where a serious mutiny or conspiracy was suppressed by the execution of two captains of vessels. In October, 1520, he discovered and passed through the strait which bears his name. Pursuing his course through the great ocean of which he was the first navigator, and which he named the Pacific, he discovered the Ladrones about the 6th of March, 1521. He proceeded thence to the Philippine Isles, and was amicably received by the Prince of Zebu or Cebu. Having become an ally of this prince in a war against another small island of the same group, Magellan was killed in battle in April, 1521. One of his ships, the Vittoria, commanded by Sebastian del Cano, returned to Spain, and was the first that circumnavigated the globe. An Italian named Pigafetta accompanied Magellan in this last voyage, and kept a journal, which was published. (See PIGAFETTA.)

Magellan or Magalhaens, (JOÃO JACINTO,) was born at Lisbon in 1723. He emigrated to England about 1764, cultivated natural philosophy with success, and was chosen a Fellow of the Royal Society, (1774.) He wrote a "Description of English Octants and Sextants," and other scientific treatises. Died near London in 1790.

Magendie, mȧ'zhŏn'de', (FRANÇOIS,) an eminent French physiologist and physician, was born at Bordeaux on the 15th of October, 1783, and was educated in Paris. He became demonstrator of anatomy in the Faculty of Medicine, Paris, about 1805. In 1816 he produced a manual of physiology, "Précis élémentaire de Physiologie," which was translated into German and English. He was admitted into the Academy of Sciences about 1821, and became professor of anatomy or medicine in the College of France in 1831. His experiments contributed greatly to the progress of physiology. Among his important services was the discovery or demonstration of the functions of the spinal nerves. The honour of this discovery, however, is shared by Charles Bell. Magendie discovered that in the circulation of the blood, the arteries act not by irritability, but by elasticity, and proved that the veins are organs of absorption. He experimented on living animals more than any of his predecessors. Among his principal works are "Lectures on the Physical Phenomena of Life," ("Leçons sur les Phénomènes physiques de la Vie," 4 vols., 1836–42,) and "Lectures on the Functions and Diseases of the Nervous System," (2 vols., 1839.) He founded in 1821 the "Journal of Experimental Physiology," which he continued to edit until 1831. He was appointed president of the board of public health (comité consultatif d'hygiène publique) in 1848. Died in October, 1855.

Mageoghegan, (JAMES.) See MACGEOHEGAN.

Maggi, mȧd'jee, [Lat. MAD'DIUS,] (CARLO MARIA,) an Italian poet, born at Milan in 1630. He became a member of the Academy Della Crusca, and professor of Greek in Milan. His works consist of Greek, Latin, and Italian poems, of Letters, etc. "Maggi bore an honourable part," says Hallam, "in the restoration of poetry." Died in 1699.

See L. A. MURATORI, "Vita di C. M. Maggi, Milanese," 1700; TIRABOSCHI, "Storia della Letteratura Italiana."

Maggi, (GIOVANNI,) an Italian painter and etcher, born in Rome about 1566; died after 1618.

Maggi, (GIROLAMO,) a lawyer and writer, born at Anghiari, in Tuscany. About 1560 he settled in Venice, where he published several works, among which were "The War of Flanders," a poem, and "Variæ Lectiones." Having been made prisoner by the Turks in Cyprus, he attempted to escape, was recaptured, and strangled in Constantinople in 1572.

Maggi, (LUCILIO FILALTEO,) a learned Italian physician, was born at Brescia about 1510. He obtained the chair of medicine in the University of Pavía about 1553. He wrote "Familiar Letters" ("Epistolæ Familiares") on the literary history of Italy. Died about 1570.

Maggio, mȧd'jo, or Magio, mȧ'jo, (FRANCESCO MARIA,) a monk, born at Palermo in 1612, became skilled in Oriental languages. He was employed as a missionary in Syria, Georgia, etc., and wrote a "Grammar of the Georgian Language." Died in 1686.

Mā'ġi, a religious sect or priestly caste of ancient Persia, which had exclusive possession of scientific knowledge. They worshipped fire and the sun, and were reformed by Zoroaster. In the Gospel certain members of this caste are mentioned as "wise men of the East." (See Matthew ii. 1.) In process of time the term Magi became synonymous with philosophers, learned men, astronomers, and soothsayers, or dealers in magic arts.

Mą-ġill', (EDWARD H.,) LL.D., an American educator and scholar, was born in Bucks county, Pennsylvania, September 24, 1825. He graduated at Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, in 1852. The same year he became principal of the classical department of the Providence High School, which position he held till 1859, when he was appointed sub-master of the Boston Latin School. Having in 1867 resigned his place in the Latin School, he spent some time in foreign travel. In 1871 he became president of Friends' College, at Swarthmore, in Delaware county, Pennsylvania. The high degree of prosperity which that institution has enjoyed is due in no small measure both to his rare skill as an instructor and to his wise and efficient government. President Magill is a zealous advocate of the co-education of the sexes, and the complete and signal success of this system at Swarthmore furnishes a practical argument in its favour not easy to refute or resist. During his connection with the Boston Latin School, Mr. Magill published a French Grammar and a series of French Readers which have been widely used in the schools and colleges of our country.

Magini, mâ-jee'nee, (GIOVANNI ANTONIO,) an Italian astronomer, born at Padua in 1555. He was professor of mathematics at Bologna from 1588 to 1617, and wrote many works, among which are "Ephemerides," and "New Theories of the Celestial Orbs," ("Novæ Cœlestium Orbium Theoriæ," 1589.) Died in 1617.

See LALANDE, "Bibliothèque astronomique."

Ma-ginn', (WILLIAM,) a witty and versatile writer, born at Cork, in Ireland, about 1793. He removed to London about 1824, and adopted literature as a profession. About this time he was a frequent contributor to "Blackwood's Magazine," in which he appears as the "Morgan O'Doherty" of the "Noctes Ambrosianæ." About 1828 he became sub-editor of "The Standard," a Tory paper, and began to write able and caustic articles for "Fraser's Magazine." He also wrote a novel called "Whitehall." Died in 1842.

See "Autobiography of William Jerdan," vol. iii. chap. vii.; "Fraser's Magazine" for January, 1831, (with a portrait,) and for February, March, and April, 1838.

Magirus, mâ-jee'rûs, (TOBIAS,) a German philosopher, born at Angermünde in 1586, taught logic and physics at Frankfort-on-the-Oder. Died in 1651.

Magistris, de, dẹh mâ-jès'trĕss, (GIACINTO,) an Italian missionary, born in the diocese of Cremona in 1605; died at Goa, India, in 1666.

Magistris, de, (SIMONE,) an Italian priest, noted for his mastery of ancient languages, was born in Corsica in 1728; died at Rome in 1802.

Magliabecchi, mâl-yâ-bek'kee, (ANTONIO,) an Italian bibliomaniac and librarian, noted for his prodigious memory and learning, was born at Florence in 1633. He devoured a great number of books with avidity, became versed in languages and antiquities, and was regarded as an oracle by the learned. His habits were very eccentric. He was for many years librarian of Cosimo III., Grand Duke of Tuscany, and of his successors. At his death, in 1714, he left his rich library to the city of Florence, by which it is kept open to the public.

Magnan, mân'yôN', (BERNARD PIERRE,) a French general, born in Paris in 1791. He served as captain at Waterloo, (1815,) and obtained the rank of colonel about 1827, after which he was employed in Algeria. He became a lieutenant-general in 1845, and commanded the army of the Alps in 1849. In July, 1851, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army of Paris, and in December, 1852, he was raised to the rank of marshal of France. Died in 1865.

See J. LASSAGNE, "Notice sur le Général Magnan," 1852.

Magnan, (DOMINIQUE,) a French antiquary and monk, born at Raillane in 1731. He lived in Avignon and Rome, and acquired a European reputation by his works, among which are a "Description of the City of Rome," (1763,) and several treatises on numismatics. Died in 1796.

Magnani, mân-yâ'nee, (CRISTOFORO,) an able Italian painter, born at Pizzighettone before 1550, was a pupil of Bernardino Campi.

Magnasco, mân-yâs'ko, (ALESSANDRO,) called LISSANDRINO, an Italian painter, born at Genoa in 1681. His favourite subjects were processions, etc. Died in 1747.

Magnasco, (STEFANO,) a painter, born about 1630, was the father of the preceding. Died in 1665.

Magne, mâñ, (PIERRE,) a French advocate and minister of state, born at Périgueux in 1806. He was appointed minister of public works in January, 1851, and minister of finance in February, 1855. He retired from this office about 1861. Died in 1879.

Magnence. See MAGNENTIUS.

Magnentius, mâg-nĕn'she-us, [Fr. MAGNENCE, mân'yŏNss',] (FLAVIUS,) a Roman general, born in Germany about 300 A.D. While commanding an army in Gaul, he revolted against the emperor Constans, and usurped the empire of the West in 350. Constans was killed by his orders. Magnentius made himself master of the city of Rome. A war ensued between him and Constantius, who defeated the usurper on the river Drave in 351. He retreated to Gaul, was again defeated, and killed himself in August, 353 A.D.

Magnier, mân'ye-a', (LAURENT,) called also MANIÈRE, a French sculptor, born in Paris in 1618; died in 1700.

Magnin, mân'yăN', (CHARLES,) a French critic, born in Paris in 1793. He acquired reputation as a critic of dramatic literature. Among his works are a series of "Lectures on the Drama," (1838,) and "Causeries et Méditations historiques et littéraires," (2 vols., 1842.) Died in 1862.

Magnocavalli, mân-yo-kâ-vâl'lee, (FRANCESCO OTTAVIO,) Count de Varengo, an Italian poet, born at Casal in 1707, wrote "Corradin, Marquis de Montferrat," and other tragedies. Died in 1788.

Magnol, mân'yol', (PIERRE,) a French botanist and physician, born at Montpellier in 1638. He became professor of botany in his native city in 1694, before which he had published "Introduction to the General History of Plants," ("Prodromus Historiæ generalis Plantarum," 1689.) He had some sound ideas on botanical philosophy, and shares with other botanists of his time the merit of favouring the progress of the natural method. He wrote several minor works on botany. The genus Magnolia was named in his honour. Died in 1715.

See "Biographie Médicale."

Magnon, mân'yôN', (JEAN,) a mediocre French poet and dramatist, born at Tournus. He left unfinished a poem entitled "La Science universelle," (1663.) He was assassinated at Paris in 1662.

Mag'nus I., King of Norway, surnamed THE GOOD, was the son of Saint Olaüs. He became king in 1034, and at the death of Canute II., in 1042, obtained the throne of Denmark. He died in 1047, leaving Norway to Harold, and Denmark to Sweyn, a nephew of Canute the Great.

See TORFÆUS, "Historia Rerum Norvegicarum."

Magnus, surnamed LADULOS, King of Sweden, born in 1240, was the second son of Birger. He deposed his own brother, Waldemar, and reigned many years. He died in 1298, and was succeeded by his son, Birger.

Magnus, surnamed SMEK, King of Sweden, born in 1316, was the son of Duke Eric, and succeeded Birger in 1320. His actual reign began in 1337. He was placed under interdict by the pope, and deposed by his nobles about 1363, when Albert of Mecklenburg became king. Magnus died in 1374.

See F. RÜHS, "Geschichte Schwedens."

Mag'nus, a Greek physician, lived about 100 A.D. He was one of the Pneumatic sect.

Magnus, (ALBERTUS.) See ALBERTUS MAGNUS.

Magnus, mâg'nŭs, (EDUARD,) a German painter of genre and portraits, born at Berlin in 1799. His works are commended as excellent in colour and correct in design. Died August 9, 1872.

Magnus, (HEINRICH GUSTAV,) a German physicist, born at Berlin, May 2, 1802. In 1834 he was made extraordinary professor of physics there, and in 1845 full professor. His main reputation came from his experiments and papers respecting heat, on the physics of gases, and on capillarity. He also made some chemical discoveries. Died April 4, 1870.

Magnus, mâg'nŭs, or Magni, mâg'nee, (JOHAN or JONAS,) Archbishop of Upsal, was born at Linköping in 1488. He opposed the Reformation in Sweden without success, and retired to Rome, where he died in 1544. He was author of a "History of Sweden," in Latin, ("Historia Gothorum Suevorumque," 1554.)

See NICÉRON, "Mémoires;" SCHEFFER, "Suecia Literata."

Magnus, (OLAUS or OLOF,) a Swedish prelate, brother of the preceding, was born at Linköping about 1490. He was sent by Pope Paul III. to the Council of Trent in 1546. He wrote (in Latin) a "History of the Northern Nations," (1555,) which was translated into English, Dutch, German, and Italian. Died in Rome in 1568.

Magny, de, deh mȧn'yè', (OLIVIER,) a French poet, born at Cahors about 1524. He was a lover of Louise Labé, and a follower of the Pléiade. His "Odes," "Amours," "Soupirs," "Gayetés," etc., evince much talent. Died in 1560.

Mā'go, [Gr. Μάγων; Fr. MAGON, mȧ'gôN',] a Carthaginian admiral, who gained a victory over the fleet of Syracuse about 396 B.C. A few years later he was defeated by Dionysius in Sicily. He returned to Carthage, and was elected chief magistrate. Having led another land-army into Sicily, he was killed, and his army was defeated at Cabala by Dionysius, about 382 B.C. His son, MAGO, succeeded to the command of the army, and prosecuted the war with success.

Another MAGO commanded a fleet which the senate of Carthage sent, in 280 B.C., to aid the Romans against Pyrrhus. He was grandfather of Hannibal.

See DIODORUS SICULUS.

Mago, a Carthaginian writer of uncertain period, was called "the father of agriculture" by Columella. He wrote an extensive work on agriculture, which was translated into Latin by the order of the Roman senate after the destruction of Carthage.

Mago, a brother of the famous Hannibal, followed him in the invasion of Italy, and held a high command at the battle of Cannæ, 216 B.C. He carried the news of this victory to Carthage, and solicited reinforcements, but was ordered to Spain, where he and Hasdrubal commanded for several years against the Scipios with various success. After gaining some advantages in Liguria, where he was severely wounded, he was ordered to hasten to the defence of Carthage, but he died during the voyage, in 203 B.C.

MAHA, mą-hȧ', [from the adjective măhăt, "great,"] a Sanscrit prefix forming a portion of many Indian names, as MAHÂDEVA, "great god," MAHÂ-PRALYA, the "great destruction," etc. See these names in their alphabetical place.

Mahâ-Bali. See BALI.

Măhâbhârătă, mą-hȧ'bȧ'rą-tą, or Măhâbhârăt, mą-hȧ'bȧ'rąt, [from the Sanscrit măhă, "great," and Bhârătă, a descendant of Bhărătă, a famous Hindoo prince,] the name of the great epic poem of the Hindoos, so called because it treats of the war waged among the descendants of Bharata. It is said to contain 200,000 lines, or 100,000 double verses. Tradition ascribes it to Vyâsa, the arranger or editor of the Vedas. (See VYÂSA.) But there is reason to believe that it is the production or compilation of several—perhaps of many—writers, living in different ages, both before and after the Christian era. It was made a kind of cyclopædia of such knowledge as was deemed desirable for the Kshatriyas, or warrior caste.

See the article on "Sanscrit Literature" in the "New American Cyclopædia," (by PROFESSOR WHITNEY,) xiv., p. 337.

Măhâdêvă, mą-hȧ'dā'vą, or Mahâ-Deo, mą-hȧ' dā'o, (i.e. the "great god,") the name by which Siva is commonly known in many parts of India. (See SIVA.)

Mą-haf'fy, (JOHN PENTLAND,) an eminent scholar and critic, born at Chaponnaire, near Vevay, Switzerland, February 26, 1839. He graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1856. He was appointed professor of ancient history in that institution in 1871, and became distinguished for his versatility and wide attainments. He took orders in the Anglican Church. Among his books are "Twelve Lectures on Primitive Civilization," (1868.) "Prolegomena to Ancient History," (1871,) "Kant's Critical Philosophy for English Readers," (1871,) "Greek Social Life, from Homer to Menander," (1874,) "Greek Antiquities," (1876,) "Rambles and Studies in Greece," (1876,) "History of Classical Greek Literature," (1880,) etc.

Mą-han', (ASA,) D.D., an American divine, born at Vernon, New York, in 1799. He graduated at Hamilton College in 1824, and at Andover Seminary in 1827. In 1829 he was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry, and he held various pastorates in that and the Congregationalist denomination. He was chosen president of Oberlin College in 1835, and of Cleveland University in 1850. He was also (1861–71) president of Adrian College. Among his works are "Science of Intellectual Philosophy," (1845,) "Doctrine of the Will," (1846,) "The True Believer," (1847,) "Science of Moral Philosophy," (1856,) "Science of Logic," (1857,) and a work entitled "Doctrine of Christian Perfection,"—a doctrine which he earnestly maintained. Died April 4, 1889.

Mahan, (DENNIS HART,) LL.D., an American soldier and engineer, born in New York, April 2, 1802. He graduated at West Point with highest honours in 1824, and was an assistant professor there, 1824–26, and professor of engineering, 1832–71. Among his works are treatises on "Field Fortifications," (1836,) "Civil Engineering," (1837; mostly rewritten, 1868,) "On Industrial Drawing," (1853,) "Descriptive Geometry," (1864,) and "Military Engineering," (part i., 1865; part ii., 1867.) He committed suicide by drowning, near Stony Point, New York, September 16, 1871.

Mahan, (MILO,) D.D., an American theologian, brother of the preceding, was born at Suffolk, Virginia, May 24, 1819. He studied at Saint Paul's College, Flushing, New York, and in 1845 entered the Episcopalian ministry. He was professor of church history in the General Theological Seminary, New York city, from 1861 to 1864. He published "The Exercise of Faith," (1851,) "History of the Church," (1860; enlarged, 1872,) and other works, which gave him a high place among the theologians of his church. Died in Baltimore, September 3, 1870. (See his "Collected Works and Life," by J. H. Hopkins, 3 vols., 1872–75.)

Mā-hâ' Prăl'yạ, [modern Hindoo pron. mạ-hâ' prŭl'yạ,] (i.e. the "great end" or "great destruction,") a term applied to the final consummation of all things, which, it is supposed, will take place after a hundred years of Brahma have elapsed, in which each day (with its night) is reckoned as 8640 millions of our years. At the time referred to, all the gods, including Brahma, as well as all creatures, will be annihilated; Brahm, the eternal, self-existent Spirit, will alone remain.

Mahdee, Mahdy, or Mahdî, Al, ăl mâh'dee, (MOHAMMED, mo-hăm'mĕd,) the third Abbasside caliph of Bagdâd, succeeded his father, Al-Mansoor, in 775 A.D. He waged war against the Greeks with such success that the empress Irene sued for peace. He died in 785, and was succeeded by his son Hâdee, (or Hady.)

Mahdi, EL, ĕl mâ'dee, (Arabic for "the well-directed,") the title of a prophet and deliverer of Islam foretold by Mohammed; also the assumed title of Mohammed Ahmed, known to Europeans as "The False Prophet of the Soudan," who was born near Dongola, Nubia, in 1842. He worked in his youth as a boat-builder at Khartoom, and engaged in the traffic in wild animals for European menageries. He learned to read and write after becoming an adult, taught school at Khartoom, and subsequently established himself at Tamaniat as an interpreter of the Koran. Afterwards he went with some disciples to reside on the island of Aba, in the White Nile, where, by strict seclusion and austerity for six years, he acquired great fame as a holy man and was visited by pilgrims. In 1881 he announced himself by proclamation as the expected Mahdi, claiming to have all the physical signs prophesied of that personage. On the overthrow of Arabi Pasha in 1882 he acquired great ascendency in the Soudan, took possession of Sennaar, Kordofan, and Darfur, raised immense forces, and annihilated, in November, 1883, near El Obeid, the Egyptian army commanded by Hicks Pasha. In 1884 his power extended to the Red Sea, he waged war with the British at Suakim and vicinity, blockaded General Gordon at Khartoom, rejecting the title of "Sultan of Kordofan" offered him by Gordon, and forced England to send an expedition under Lord Wolseley to Khartoom for the relief of Gordon. Khartoom fell and Gordon was killed January 26, 1885.

Mahé de la Bourdonnais, mȧ'ȧ' dẹh lȧ boor'do'-nȧ', (BERNARD FRANÇOIS,) a distinguished French naval officer, born at Saint-Malo in 1699. About 1718 he entered the service of the French East India Company. He was appointed Governor-General of the Isles of France and Bourbon in 1734, and received command of a squadron in 1741. War having begun between France and England, he repulsed an English fleet near Madras, and captured that place, in 1746. He quarrelled with Dupleix, governor of the French possessions in Hindostan, who refused to give up Madras, which La Bourdonnais by treaty had agreed to restore to the English. Having been recalled to France, where he arrived in 1748, he was confined in the Bastille three years, and then tried and acquitted. His talents and virtues are praised by Saint-Pierre in the preface to "Paul and Virginia." Died in 1754 or 1755.

Mahmood, Mahmoud, or Mahmûd, mäh-mo͞od', I., Sultan of Turkey, born in 1696, was the son of Mustafa II. He succeeded his uncle, Ahmed (Achmet) III., in 1730. In 1734 he began a war against the Russians, who were assisted by the Austrians. The latter made peace and gave up Belgrade to Turkey in 1739. Soon after that date he made a treaty of peace with Russia. Mahmood left the direction of affairs to his ministers. Died in December, 1754.

See VON HAMMER, "Geschichte des Osmanischen Reichs;" LEVESQUE, "Histoire de la Russie."

Mahmood, Mahmoud, or Mahmûd II., Sultan of Turkey, a younger son of Sultan Abdool Hâmid, was born July 20, 1785. His youth was passed in seclusion or confinement and in literary pursuits. During the reign of his brother, Mustafa IV., the deposed Sultan, Selim III., was his fellow-captive, and initiated him in those projects of reform which he himself had failed to effect. In July, 1808, Mustafa was deposed by the military, and Mahmood was proclaimed Sultan at one of the most critical periods in the history of the Ottoman empire. The pashas of Asia and Africa had rendered themselves nearly independent of the Sultan, and the disaffection of the Janissaries threatened a revolution in the capital. He began the work of reform in the army, which he ordered to be organized after the European system. In November, 1808, the Janissaries rebelled, attacked the Sultan's palace, and proclaimed Mustafa. Mahmood suppressed this dangerous revolt by the execution of Mustafa and his heirs, after which he remained the only surviving prince of his race.

A war with Russia, in which the Turks had been defeated, was terminated by a treaty of peace in May, 1812. He pursued his projects of reform with courage and energy, amidst the violent opposition of his subjects. About 1822 began a general insurrection of the Greeks, who, after a war of several years, were liberated from the Turkish yoke. During this war he continued his bold innovations against the old customs and traditions; he dressed himself in the European fashion, and finally accomplished his most important measure,—the destruction of the Janissaries, who had instigated a formidable insurrection in the capital. The next day (June 15) the standard of the prophet was unfurled, and all good Mussulmans were summoned to arms. The Janissaries were outnumbered and speedily overpowered, and many thousands of them were killed. On the 16th an edict was issued for the abolition of their organization.

On the 20th of October, 1827, Mahmood's fleet was defeated and all-but annihilated at Navarino by the allied French, English, and Russians, who fought there for the liberty of Greece. Mahmood is censured for rashness in renewing the war with Russia in 1828. The Russian general Diebitsch defeated the Turks at Shumla, crossed the Balkan, and took Adrianople in 1829. The existence of the Turkish empire was in peril; but, through the mediation of England and other powers, the Sultan obtained peace (September, 1829) by paying a large sum of money and resigning the sovereignty of Moldavia, Wallachia, and Servia. In 1832 he was involved in war with Mehemet Ali of Egypt, whose army, commanded by his son Ibrâheem, (Ibrâhîm,) gained a decisive victory at Konieh, (December, 1832.) Russia interposed to protect Mahmood against his rebellious vassal. The Ottoman empire was apparently on the verge of dissolution, when the Sultan died, in June, 1839, and was succeeded by his son, Abdŏŏl-Mejeed.

Mahmood, Mahmoud, or Mahmûd, mâH′mo͝od′, (Abool-Kâsim-Yemeen-ed-Dowlah, or Abûl-(Aboul-) Kâsim-Yemîn-ed-Daulah, â′bo͝ol kâ′sim yĕh-meen′ ed-dŏw′lah,) one of the most celebrated of all the Mohammedan conquerors, the founder of the Gaznevide dynasty, and the first who established a permanent Moslem empire in India, was born at Gazna (or Ghiznee) in 967 A.D. He was the son of Sabŭktageen, whom he succeeded as governor of the province of Candahar, (or Gazna.) At an early age he distinguished himself while fighting under his father against the enemies of Nooh, (or Nouh,) the Samanide sovereign of Persia, from whom he received the title of Seif-ed-Dowlah, ("Sword of the State.") But afterwards, having been ill treated by Mansoor, a successor to Nooh, he overthrew the throne of the Samanides, and established his empire over a vast territory, including what is now called Affghanistan, besides an extensive region in the northeastern part of Persia. But, still unsatisfied, he resolved on the subjugation of the countries beyond the Indus. During a reign of rather more than thirty years, he made no fewer than twelve expeditions into India, besides carrying on several important wars in Central Asia. He extended his conquests not only over the whole of the Punjâb, but penetrated as far as Bundelcund on the east and Guzerat on the south. Moore, in his beautiful poem of "Paradise and the Peri," gives a striking picture of Mahmood's sanguinary and desolating career through Hindostan. Apostrophizing India, he says,

> "Land of the sun! what foot invades
> Thy pagods and thy pillared shades?
> 'Tis he of Gazna,—fierce in wrath
> * * * * * * *
> He comes, and India's diadems
> Lie scattered in his ruinous path.
> His bloodhounds he adorns with gems
> Torn from the violated necks
> Of many a young and loved sultana;
> Maidens within their pure zenana,
> Priests in the very fane he slaughters,
> And chokes up with the glittering wrecks
> Of golden shrines the sacred waters."
> Lalla Rookh.

It is related by Ferishta, a celebrated Moslem historian, that, having heard of the immense riches deposited in the temple of Somnâth, famous throughout all India for its sanctity, Mahmood determined to take possession of that place. The priests of Somnâth had boasted that, if he dared approach their holy shrine, he would receive from the avenging gods the just reward of his temerity. The temple stood on the extremity of a point of land in Guzerat, and was surrounded on three sides by the sea. It was defended by the Hindoos with all the courage of religious enthusiasm and all the obstinacy of despair. But nothing could withstand the valour of the fierce invaders. Mahmood, having entered the temple, was about to demolish a gigantic image, the object of the idolatrous worship of the Hindoos. The Brahmans, in great trepidation, offered him an immense sum of gold if he would spare their idol. Some of his officers advised him to accept the ransom; but his zeal as a true Moslem forbade such a compromise. He smote the image and broke it to pieces. It proved to be hollow, and a countless treasure of diamonds, rubies, and pearls was poured from its cavity upon the ground, thus richly rewarding the incorruptible zeal of the conqueror, and at the same time explaining the pious liberality of the Brahmans. In the extensive wars which Mahmood carried on in Central Asia, after his first expedition into India, he appears to have been mainly indebted for his success to the elephants used in his army. It is related that on one occasion Ilij (or Elich) Khân, a Turkish prince, invaded Khorassân with a large army. Mahmood hastily assembled an inferior force, which was accompanied, however, by five hundred elephants. The hostile armies met near Bŭlkh, (or Balkh,) in the vicinity of the river Amoo, or Oxus. Mahmood was mounted on a superb elephant, which, during the heat of the battle, rushed forward, and, seizing with his trunk the chief standard-bearer of the Turks, hurled him into the air. The other elephants followed the example of their great leader: with their trunks they lifted the horsemen from their saddles and dashed them on the ground, so that the Turkish army was soon broken and put to a total rout. Later, the military establishment of Mahmood is said to have comprised no fewer than thirteen hundred elephants and more than fifty thousand horse.

Along with great military talents and a fierce, unconquerable energy and courage, Mahmood possessed some virtues of a more exalted kind. A woman from a distant province, it is said, complained one day to the Sultan that her son had been killed and her property carried off by robbers. He replied that it was impossible for him to prevent all disorders in a region so remote. "Why, then," said the woman, "do you conquer kingdoms which you cannot protect, and for which you will have to answer at the day of judgment?" Far from resenting the freedom of this rebuke, he immediately took effective measures for establishing order in that distant part of his dominions. After his Indian conquests he not only greatly embellished Gazna, which still continued to be the capital of his empire, so that it rivalled, it is said, the most splendid cities of the East, but he showed himself a patron of science and literature, especially of poetry. It was during his reign that Firdousee, (or Firdausî,) the greatest of all the poets of Mohammedanism, flourished. (See FIRDOUSEE.) Seven other distinguished poets, according to Von Hammer, lived at his court and chanted his praises. Mahmood was the first, it is said, of the great Moslem rulers who employed the Persian language in official documents. Died in 1030.

Mahmood (Mahmoud or Mahmûd) II., surnamed NÂSIR-OOD-DEEN, (NÂSIR-OUD-DÎN,) nâ′sir o͝od-deen′, (i.e. "Defender of the Faith,") an eccentric though able Sultan of Delhi, who ascended the throne in 1246. After the death of his father, Altmish, (âlt′mish,) he was imprisoned by his step-mother, and remained in confinement several years. During this period he voluntarily earned his bread by copying manuscripts. Even after he was raised to the throne he continued, it is said, to earn his subsistence by his pen. As a king he was distinguished for his ability, justice, and liberality; he was a patron of learning, the protector of his people, and a friend of the poor. He was a successful general, and speedily reduced several insurrections which broke out during his reign. Contrary to the custom of Moslem princes, Mahmood had but one wife, whom he required to be as industrious as himself, and to perform all the homely duties of housewifery like the meanest of her subjects. Her majesty, having one day burned her fingers while cooking, begged Mahmood to let her have a maid to assist her; but he refused, saying he was but a trustee of the state and had no right to burden it with needless expenses. He used to say, "Those who will not work for their bread do not deserve it." Mahmood Nâsir-ood-Deen was a half-brother of the distinguished Sultana Ruzeea Begum. (See RUZEEA BEGUM.) He died after a reign of twenty years.

Mahmood (Mahmoud or Mahmûd) Shâh, (Nâsir-ed-Deen or -Eddyn, nâ'sĭr ed-deen',) Emperor of Hindostan, was the son of Mohammed III. He ascended the throne of Delhi in 1394, and was a feeble ruler. His reign was a disastrous period of intestine wars and anarchy. Timur (Tamerlane) invaded India, defeated the army of Mahmood in 1399, and took Delhi. A few years later, Mahmood returned to Delhi, but he obtained but little power. He died in 1413, being the last of his dynasty.

Ma-hom'ĕt* [Fr. pron. mȧ'o'mȧ'] or Mohammed (mo-hăm'mĕd) I., Emperor or Sultan of the Ottomans, born in 1374, was a younger son of Bayazeed (Bajazet) I., who was defeated by Tamerlane at Ancyra in 1401. At this time he was governor of Amasia, of which the victor left him in possession. Mahomet and his brother Moosa (Mousa) having appealed to arms for a decision of their claims to the throne, the latter was killed in battle in 1413. Mahomet restored the Ottoman empire to its former stability, subjected the Bosnians and Servians, and was the first Sultan that disputed with the Venetians the empire of the sea. He died in 1421, and was succeeded by his son, Amurath II.

See VON HAMMER, "Geschichte des Osmanischen Reichs."

Mahomet or Mohammed II., styled THE GREAT, the son of Amurath II., was born in 1430, and succeeded his father in 1451. Having raised an army of about 300,000 men, he attacked Constantinople, defended by the Greek emperor Constantine Palæologus. After a siege of fifty-five days, the city was taken by storm on the 29th of May, 1453, and Constantine was killed fighting in the breach. Great numbers of the Greek citizens were massacred by the orders or permission of the victor, who in 1456 returned to Adrianople, his former capital. In that year he was defeated at Belgrade by the Hungarian chief Huniades. He conquered Trebizond from David Comnenus in 1461, and afterwards acquired by his arms Bosnia, and several islands in the Archipelago. In 1465 he was defeated by Scanderbeg in Albania. He waged successful wars against the Venetians and the Persians, (1470–78,) and invaded Italy in 1480. Death arrested his progress to further conquest in 1481, and delivered Christian nations from a formidable adversary. He left the throne to his son, Bayazeed (Bajazet) II.

Mahomet or Mohammed III., Sultan of Turkey, was born about 1568, and succeeded his father, Amurath III., in 1595. He put his brothers to death in the first days of his reign. He was a feeble ruler, and preferred the pursuit of pleasure to his duties as a monarch. Among the chief events of his reign was a war with the emperor Rudolph in Hungary, where the Turks lost several towns. He died in 1603, and was succeeded by his son, Ahmed (Achmet) I.

See VON HAMMER, "Geschichte des Osmanischen Reichs."

Mahomet or Mohammed IV., the son and successor of Ibrâheem I., was seven years old when his father was killed by the Janissaries in 1649. Having a ruling passion for the chase, he permitted the grand vizier, Mahomet Köprili, to direct the affairs of the empire. That able minister took Lemnos and Mitylene from the Venetians in 1660, and about the same time waged war against the Austrians in Hungary. After several victories, the Turks were defeated at Saint Gothard on the Raab in 1663, and the war was suspended by a treaty. In that year Köprili died, and his son Ahmed (Achmet) became grand vizier. He took the capital of Candia in 1669, after a long siege. In 1683 a Turkish army of about 200,000 men under Cara Mustafa invaded Austria and besieged Vienna, from which the emperor Leopold fled without offering battle. After a siege of nearly two months, John Sobieski marched to the relief of the city, and put the Turks to a total rout. In consequence of this and other later reverses, Mahomet was deposed in 1687, and was succeeded by his brother, Solyman II. Mahomet was imprisoned until his death, in 1691.

Mahon, mȧ'ôn', (PAUL AUGUSTIN OLIVIER,) a French physician, born at Chartres in 1752. He wrote "Médecine légale," (3 vols., 1802.) Died in 1801.

Ma-hōne', (WILLIAM,) an American Senator, was born near Monroe, Southampton county, Virginia, December 1, 1826. He graduated at the Virginia Military Institute in 1847, and became a civil engineer and railroad-president. He entered the Confederate army as colonel in 1861, and rose to be major-general, winning great distinction as a fighting corps-commander. After the war he resumed the railway-presidency. Entering the field of politics, he combined the Republican and Readjuster parties of Virginia, and in 1881 took his seat in the United States Senate.

Ma-ho'nў, (FRANCIS,) an Irish writer and wit, born about 1805, wrote under the assumed name of "Father Prout." He contributed many able articles to "Fraser's Magazine," which were published separately in 1860. He also wrote as correspondent for several daily journals of London. Died in 1866.

Mahudel, mȧ'ü'dĕl', (NICOLAS,) a French antiquary, born at Langres in 1673. He practised medicine in Paris for many years. He wrote a "Treatise on the Ancient Medals or Coins of Spain," (1725,) and several antiquarian treatises inserted in the records of the Academy of Inscriptions. Died in 1747.

Mahul, mȧ'ül', (ALPHONSE JACQUES,) a French political writer, born at Carcassone in 1795. He published a valuable work entitled "Annuaire nécrologique, ou Supplément annuel et Continuation de toutes les Biographies," (6 vols., 1821–26.) Died August 25, 1871.

Mai, mȧ'ee or mī, (ANGELO,) CARDINAL, a celebrated Italian critic and philologist, born at Schilpario, in the province of Bérgamo, on the 7th of March, 1782. He became an excellent classical scholar, and about 1808 was admitted as an associate in the Ambrosian Library of Milan, which was rich in ancient manuscripts. He applied himself to the task of deciphering palimpsests, and discovered portions of Cicero's orations and other classic works which had never been printed. In 1819 he was appointed chief librarian of the Vatican at Rome. The discovery which made the greatest sensation was that of six books of Cicero, "De Republica," which he published, with able critical notes, in 1822. These books, which had been lost since the twelfth century, were found by him in the Vatican. Among the monuments of his critical sagacity and patient research are three collections, entitled "A New Collection of Ancient Authors, produced from the Library of the Vatican," ("Scriptorum Veterum nova Collectio e Vaticanis Codicibus edita," 10 vols. 4to, 1825–38,) "Classic Writers published from the Manuscripts of the Vatican," ("Classici Scriptores ex Codicibus Vaticanis editi," 10 vols., 1828–38,) and "New Library of the Fathers," ("Nova Bibliotheca Patrum," 6 vols., 1845–53.) He was raised to the dignity of cardinal in 1838, was chosen a foreign associate of the French Institute in 1842, and librarian of the Roman Church in 1853. Died in September, 1854.

Maiano or Majano, da, mā-yā′no, (BENEDETTO,) an eminent Italian sculptor and architect, was born in Tuscany, perhaps in Florence, in 1424, or, according to other authorities, in 1442. He acquired fame first by his unrivalled skill in inlaid work, and afterwards devoted himself to sculpture in marble. He worked in Florence and Naples. Among his best productions are a bust of Giotto, and a marble pulpit of Santa Croce, (in Florence,) in which he represented the life of Saint Francis. Died in 1498.

Maikof, Maikov, Maikoff, or Maikow, mī-kof′, (VASIL IVANOVITCH,) a Russian soldier and poet, born at Yaroslaf in 1725. He obtained some reputation for humour and comic power by his "Yelisei, or Bacchus Enraged," a burlesque poem. He also wrote several dramas and fables. Died in 1778.

Mailáth or Majláth, mī′lȧt, (JÁNOS NEPOMUK,) COUNT, an eminent Hungarian poet and historian, was born at Pesth in 1786. He was employed many years in the civil service of Austria. In the affairs of Hungary he was identified with the conservatives, or adversaries of Kossuth. He published, in German, two important works, a "History of the Magyars," (1828–31,) and a "History of the Austrian Empire," (1834–50.) The revolution of 1848 deprived him of his official employment as judex curiæ at Pesth, and reduced him to extreme poverty. He and his daughter Henrietta drowned themselves in Lake Starnberg, in Bavaria, in 1855. He left several poems and translations. He was highly respected as a man.

Maintenon, de, dẹh mânt'nôn', (François d'Aubigné,) Marquise, a French lady, whose life was marked by romantic adventures and surprising vicissitudes, was born in 1635, in the prison of Niort, (where her father, Constant d'Aubigné, was detained.) She was a granddaughter of the eminent author T. A. d'Aubigné. Having become a poor orphan, she was constrained by her guardians to abjure Calvinism. To escape the miseries of dependence on her unkind godmother, she married in 1652 Scarron the burlesque poet and wit, who was infirm and deformed in person. His house was a fashionable resort of the most brilliant wits and noblesse of Paris. He died in 1660, leaving her again destitute of resources except her rare beauty and talents. Her eyes are described as dark, intensely spiritual, and inexpressibly lustrous. She received a pension of 2000 livres from the queen-mother for several years preceding the death of the latter, in 1666.

About 1670 Madame Scarron was selected as governess of the Duc du Maine, a son of Louis XIV. and Madame de Montespan. The king presented to her the estate of Maintenon in 1674, after which she was called Madame de Maintenon. She gradually gained a complete ascendant over Louis, and was secretly married to him in 1685. The marriage was never formally avowed by him. "It would be hard to name any woman," says Macaulay, "who, with so little romance in her temper, has had so much in her life. . . . A just understanding; an inexhaustible yet never redundant flow of rational, sprightly conversation; a temper of which the serenity was never for a moment ruffled; a tact which surpassed the tact of her sex as much as the tact of her sex surpasses the tact of ours: such were the qualities which made the widow of a buffoon first the confidential friend and then the spouse of the proudest and most powerful of European kings." Madame de Sévigné describes her society as "truly delicious."

She laboured assiduously to convert the king to vital religion. Louis transacted business with his ministers in her apartment, discussed the most important questions in her presence, and often asked her advice in these terms: "Qu'en pense votre Solidité?" ("What does your Solidity think about it?") He was once dissuaded by her from the cruel purpose of burning the city of Treves. As the king grew old and fretful, her task of entertaining him became very arduous. "I have seen her," says Mlle. d'Aumale, "divert the king by a thousand inventions for four hours together, without repetition, yawning, or slander." She founded a good school for girls at Saint-Cyr. She died in 1719. Her letters and other works have been published by M. Lavallée, in 10 vols., (1854 et seq.) This edition includes "Souvenirs de Mme. de Caylus," and "Mémoires de Mlle. d'Aumale."

Maitland, (JOHN,) of Thirlestane, first Lord Maitland, an eminent Scottish statesman, born about 1540, was the second son of Sir Richard Maitland, noticed below, and grandfather of the Duke of Lauderdale. He was appointed keeper of the privy seal in 1567. For his loyalty to Queen Mary he was proscribed by the dominant party about 1570 and imprisoned several years. In 1584 he was made secretary of state, and became in fact the chief minister of James VI. He was appointed chancellor of Scotland in 1586 or 1587, and created Baron Maitland in 1590. He is praised for his moderation and integrity as well as for his talents. Several of his Latin epigrams have been published. Died in 1595.

Maitland, (Rev. SAMUEL ROFFEY,) D.D., F.R.S., an able English essayist and writer on ecclesiastical history, etc., was born in London in 1792. He was librarian to the Archbishop of Canterbury from 1837 to 1848. He was author of numerous essays on theology, morals, etc. Among his principal and most popular works is "The Dark Ages: being a Series of Essays intended to Illustrate the State of Religion and Literature in the Ninth, Tenth, Eleventh, and Twelfth Centuries," (1844.) He aims to prove that those ages were not so dark as they are commonly represented. Died in 1866.

Maitland, (Sir WILLIAM,) of Lethington, Lithington, or Lidington, an able Scottish minister of state, was the eldest son of Sir Richard, noticed above. In 1558 he became principal secretary to Mary of Guise, queen-regent; but in 1559 he joined the Protestant chiefs who had taken arms against her. He was restored to the office of secretary of state by Mary Queen of Scots in 1561. Though not a Catholic, he enjoyed the favour and confidence of the queen, who sent him on several embassies to Queen Elizabeth. After Mary was imprisoned, (1567,) he adhered to her cause, and united with the Duke of Norfolk in an effort to save her. Having failed in an attempt to mediate between the two hostile parties, in 1570 he declared openly for the queen. His enemy, Regent Morton, took him prisoner, and would probably have hung him if Maitland had not died soon after, as some suppose, by his own hand, in 1573. "All the contemporary writers," says Robertson, "mention him with an admiration which nothing could have excited but the greatest superiority of penetration and abilities." "His name," says Burton, "was a by-word for subtlety and state-craft. Yet, . . . if we look at his life and doings, we do not find he was one of those who have left the mark of their influence upon their age. . . . He had great abilities, but they were rather those of the wit and rhetorician than of the practical man." ("History of Scotland," vol. iv. pp. 55–57.) Hume styles Maitland "Secretary Lidington." Queen Elizabeth called him "the flower of the wits of Scotland."

Malabranca, mâ-lâ-brân'kâ, (LATINO,) an Italian Dominican, called also Frangipani, was a nephew of Pope Nicholas III. He was made Bishop of Ostia and Velletri in 1278. His diplomatic talents were employed and approved by several successive popes. Died about 1294. The celebrated hymn "Dies Iræ" is attributed to him by many writers.

Malacarne, mâ-lâ-kar'nâ, (MICHELE VINCENZO,) an Italian surgeon, born at Saluzzo in 1744. He contributed by his works to the progress of science in Italy. He was professor of surgery at Padua from 1794 until his death, in 1816. Among his works is a treatise on Encephalotomy.

Mal'a-chī, [Heb. מַלְאָכִי,] the last of the minor Hebrew prophets, is supposed to have prophesied about 420 B.C. Nothing is positively known of his history. The name signifies "angel," or "messenger of the Lord." The book of Malachi is the last book of the Old Testament, in the order of time as well as of position.

Malachowski, mâ-lâ-kov'skee, (CASIMIR,) a Polish general, born in 1765. He had the chief command at Warsaw when that place was taken by the Russians in 1831. Died in 1845.

Malachy (mal'a-kĭ) II., or Maelsechlainn, a king of Ireland, the last of the Hui Neill dynasty who was undisputed over-king of the whole island. He gained the throne in 980, and soon after won a great battle at Tara over the Danes of Dublin, Man, and the Isles. In 989 he took Dublin. He had, in later years, continual warfare with Danes and Irish vassals alike, and in 1001 submitted to Brian Boroihme.

Malachy, SAINT, (in Irish, MAELMAEDOG UA MORGAIR,) also called Imar Malachy, an Irish archbishop, born at Armagh about 1095, of a noble race. He became about 1127 Bishop of Connor and Dromore, where he did much to introduce the Roman obedience. In 1129 he was promoted to be Archbishop of Armagh, but actually held that see only from 1134 to 1137, when he took the bishopric of Down. While at Rome in 1139 he was made papal legate a latere, with authority to visit and reform the Irish Church. In 1148 he convened a national council at Inis Phadrig, and in the same year went to meet the pope at Clairvaux, where he died, in the arms of Saint Bernard, November 2, 1148. The celebrated "Prophecy of Saint Malachy regarding the Lives of Future Pontiffs" was not written by him.

Malagrida, mâ-lâ-gree'dâ, (GABRIELE,) an Italian Jesuit, born in the Milanese in 1689. He removed to Portugal, became a popular preacher, and wrote several works. He was suspected of complicity in the attempt to assassinate the King of Portugal, (1758,) and was convicted of heresy, for which he was burned in 1761.

Malan, mă'lŏN', (ABRAHAM HENRI CÉSAR,) a Swiss theologian, born at Geneva in 1787, was the leader of a sect sometimes called môtiers. Died in 1864.

See the "Life, Labours, etc. of Cæsar Malan," by his son, London, 1869.

Malan, (SOLOMON CÆSAR,) D.D., a Swiss-English clergyman and linguist, born at Geneva in 1812, a son of the preceding. He graduated at Saint Edmund Hall, Oxford, in 1837. He went to Calcutta and became a professor in Bishop's College, but returned to Oxford, took priest's orders in the English Church, and attained various preferments, being a prebendary of Sarum from 1871 to 1875. He has published a vast number of translations from Oriental languages, (Chinese, Armenian, Georgian, Coptic, Geez, Russian, Japanese, etc.,) very often of works of much interest in connection with liturgical and doctrinal questions. Dr. Malan is also gifted as an artist, musician, and naturalist. He is said to converse fluently in twenty-five languages and to be able to translate over one hundred. Since Mezzofanti, he ranks as the greatest living polyglot scholar, but is latterly rivalled by Dr. Leitner in this regard.

Malapert, mȧ'lȧ'pair', (CHARLES,) a Flemish poet and geometer, born at Mons in 1581. He became a Jesuit, and a professor of mathematics in various colleges. He published Latin poems, and several works on geometry. Died in Spain about 1630.

Malatesta, mȧ-lȧ-tês'tȧ, a noble Italian family, which acquired the lordship of Rimini in the thirteenth century, and furnished several leaders of the Guelph party. MALATESTA II. and GALEOTTO MALATESTI, sons of Pandolfe I., began to reign over Rimini in 1335. They had a great military reputation, and next to the Visconti were perhaps the most powerful princes of Italy. The former died in 1364, and Galeotto in 1385, leaving two sons, CARLO and PANDOLFO III. These two became able generals, and commanded the army of Visconti, Duke of Milan, from 1393 to 1408. Carlo, who was Lord of Rimini, died without issue in 1429. The descendants of Pandolfo III. possessed Rimini until 1528, when it was added to the papal dominions.

Malatesta, (BATTISTA,) an Italian lady of eminent talents, was married in 1405 to Galeotto Malatesta, Seigneur of Pésaro. She taught philosophy in public, made Latin orations before the emperor and pope, and wrote some admired verses.

Malaval, mȧ'lȧ'vȧl', (FRANÇOIS,) a French mystic, born at Marseilles in 1627, became blind in infancy, but studied Latin with success. He published, besides several prose works of a mystical character, "Poésies spirituelles," ("Spiritual Poems.") Died in 1719.

Măl-bōne', (EDWARD G.,) an American portrait-painter, born at Newport, Rhode Island, in 1777. He visited Europe in 1801 in company with Washington Allston, but returned the same year to America, where he soon acquired a high reputation in his art. Died in 1807.

Malchus, von, fon mȧl'kŭs, (KARL AUGUST,) BARON, a German writer, born at Mannheim in 1770, was appointed minister of the interior in the kingdom of Westphalia in 1813. He published several works on political economy. Died in 1840.

Malcolm (mȧl'kọm) I., King of Scots, the son of Donald IV., succeeded his cousin, Constantine III., in 938 A.D. He was killed by some of his own subjects who had revolted; but the date of this event is not known.

Malcolm II., King of Scotland, was the son of Kenneth III. He began to reign in 1003, and resisted several hostile incursions of the Danes with success. He died in 1033, leaving two daughters, one of whom was the mother of Duncan I.

Malcolm III., surnamed CANMORE, ("Great Head,") was the son of King Duncan, whose virtues and tragical fate are commemorated in Shakspeare's "Macbeth." When Duncan was killed, in 1040, Malcolm escaped to England. (See MACBETH.) He returned with an army, defeated Macbeth, and ascended the throne in 1057. About 1090 a war commenced between William II. of England and Malcolm, who was killed in battle at Alnwick Castle in 1093. His sons Alexander and David became kings.

See BURTON, "History of Scotland," vol. i. chap. xi.

Malcolm IV., King of Scotland, was born about 1140, and succeeded his grandfather, David I., in 1153. He made peace with Henry II. of England by ceding to him Northumberland. He died in 1165, and was succeeded by his brother William.

See BURTON, "History of Scotland," vol. ii. chaps. xiii., xiv.; BUCHANAN, "Rerum Scoticarum Historia."

Malcolm, mȧl'kọm, (JAMES PELLER,) an engraver and antiquary, born in Philadelphia about 1768. He visited Europe in his youth, and became a student in the Royal Academy of London. He published "Londinum Redivivum; or, The Ancient History and Modern Description of London," (1802–05,) "Seventy Views taken within the Compass of Twelve Miles round London," (1811,) and other works. Died in 1815.

Malcolm, mȧl'kọm, (Sir JOHN,) G.C.B., a British general and eminent historian, born in Dumfriesshire, Scotland, in 1769. In his youth he went to India as a cadet in the army of the Company. After performing an important political mission to Persia, (1799,) he was appointed to the presidency of Mysore in 1803. He was minister-plenipotentiary to the court of Persia in 1809 and 1810. Having collected information respecting Persia, he went to England in 1812, and published a valuable "History of Persia" (1815) from the earliest times to the date of publication. He returned to India in 1817, obtained the rank of brigadier-general, and, as second in command, distinguished himself at the battle of Mehidpoor, where Holkar was defeated. For several ensuing years he governed Malwa and the adjacent provinces in a manner which is highly commended. He returned to England in 1821, with the rank of major-general, was appointed Governor of Bombay in 1827, and resigned that post about the end of 1830. Sir John published, besides other works, a "Political History of India," (from 1784 to 1823,) and left a "Life of Lord Clive," which appeared in 1836. He was a brother of Admiral Sir Pulteney Malcolm. Died in 1833.

Malcolm, (Sir PULTENEY,) G.C.B., a British admiral, born near Langholm, Scotland, in 1768, was a brother of the preceding. He entered the navy in 1778, fought against the French in the West Indies, and was made a post-captain in 1794. He escorted the army of Sir Arthur Wellesley to Portugal in 1808, and obtained the rank of rear-admiral in 1813. In 1816 and 1817 he was commander-in-chief of the Saint Helena station, where his duty called him into intercourse with Bonaparte, who expressed himself much pleased with his manners and conduct. He was promoted to the rank of full admiral in 1837. Died in 1838.

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen," (Supplement.)

Măl'cọm, (HOWARD,) D.D., a Baptist divine, born in Philadelphia in 1799, was one of the founders of the American Tract Society and of the American Sunday-School Union. In 1835 he visited India and China, and on his return published "Travels in South-Eastern Asia," (1839.) He published a "Dictionary of the Bible," which had an extensive circulation, and other religious works. Died March 25, 1879.

Malczewski, mȧl-chĕv'skee, written also Malczeski, (ANTONI,) an excellent Polish poet, born in Volhynia about 1792, was a son of a general in the Russian service. He received a French education, and entered the army in 1811. Having quitted the army in 1816, he travelled for some years, and is said to have been the first Pole that ascended Mont Blanc. His reputation is founded on a single poem, entitled "Maria; a Tale of the Ukraine," (Warsaw, 1826,) which is one of the most popular poems in the Polish language. He died poor at Warsaw in 1826.

See BIELOWSKI, "A. Malczewski," etc., 1843.

Maldachini-Pamfili, mâl-dâ-kee'nee pâm-fee'lee, (Donna OLIMPIA,) an Italian woman, noted for her ambition, vices, and political influence, was born at Viterbo in 1594. She was married to a man whose brother, J. B. Pamfili, was elected pope in 1644 and assumed the title of Innocent X. Died in 1656.

Mâl'den, (HENRY,) an English writer, born about 1800, graduated at Cambridge in 1822. He became professor of Greek in University College, London, about 1830. Died July 4, 1876.

Maldonado, mâl-do-nâ'DO, (LOPEZ,) a Spanish poet of the sixteenth century, was contemporary with Cervantes, who mentions him with eulogy.

See LONGFELLOW, "Poets and Poetry of Europe."

Maldonado, (LORENZO FERRER,) a navigator, who was born probably in Spain. He wrote a narrative of a voyage which he made, or pretended to have made, from the Atlantic to the Pacific through Behring Strait in 1588. The majority of geographers have discredited his story.

See F. DE NAVARRETE, "Historia de la Nautica."

Maldonat, mâl-do-nât', [Lat. MALDONA'TUS,] (JUAN,) a celebrated Spanish theologian, born in Estremadura in 1534. Having entered the order of Jesuits, he went to Paris about 1564, and and acquired a high reputation as a professor of theology. He is said to have been a person of great talents, learning, and piety, and to have written Latin with much purity. He wrote, besides other works, "Commentaries on the Four Evangelists," (1596,) which, says Hallam, "have been highly praised by theologians of the Protestant side." Died in 1583.

Malebranche, măl'brŏNsh', [Lat. MALEBRAN'CHIUS,] (NICOLAS,) a French metaphysical philosopher of great eminence, was born in Paris on the 6th of August, 1638. His habits in youth were retired and studious. He became a priest of the Oratory in 1660, and was a zealous Cartesian in philosophy, which was his favourite study. In 1674 he produced the first volume of his admirable and original "Search for Truth," ("Recherche de la Vérité,") which was quickly and highly appreciated. New and enlarged editions of it rapidly followed. The general design of this work is to demonstrate the harmony of the Cartesian philosophy with revealed religion. His style is eminently pure, perspicuous, and elegant, having, says Fontenelle, "all the dignity which the subject requires, and all the grace or ornament which it could properly receive." "He was," says Hallam, "a warm and almost enthusiastic admirer of Descartes, but his mind was independent, searching, and fond of its own inventions; he acknowledged no master, and in some points dissents from the Cartesian school. . . . The fame of Malebranche, and, still more, the popularity in modern times of his 'Search for Truth,' have been affected by that peculiar hypothesis, so mystically expressed, the seeing all things in God, which has been more remembered than any other part of that treatise." "He bears a striking resemblance," adds the same critic, "to his great contemporary Pascal. Both of ardent minds, endowed with strong imagination and lively wit, sarcastic, severe, fearless, disdainful of popular opinion and accredited reputations. . . . But in Malebranche there is a less overpowering sense of religion; his eye roams unblenched in the light before which that of Pascal had been veiled in awe. He has less energy, but more copiousness and variety." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") "This ingenious philosopher and beautiful writer," says Mackintosh, "is the only celebrated Cartesian who has professedly handled the Theory of Morals. . . . The manner in which he applied his principles to the particulars of human duty is excellent. He is perhaps the first philosopher who has precisely laid down, and rigidly adhered to, the great principle that virtue consists in pure intentions and dispositions of mind, without which actions, however conformable to rules, are not truly moral." He was involved in a long and intemperate controversy with Arnauld on the theory of ideas and on the doctrine of grace.

In 1687 he combined all the parts of his system, and developed them more fully, in "Conversations on Metaphysics and Religion," ("Entretiens sur la Métaphysique et la Religion.") He was author of other religious and mystical works, among which are "Christian and Metaphysical Meditations," (1683,) and a "Treatise on Morality," ("Traité de Morale," 1684.) He gave proof of his profound attainments as a geometer by a "Treatise on the Communication of Motion." Died at Paris in October, 1715.

Malermi, mâ-lêr'mee, or Malerbi, mâ-lêr'bee, (NICOLÒ,) an Italian translator, born in Venice in 1422. He produced (1471) the first Italian version of the Bible that was ever printed.

Malesherbes, de, dẹh măl'zą̀rb', (CHRÉTIEN GUILLAUME DE Lamoignon—lă'mwą̃n'yŏN',) a meritorious French judge and philanthropist, born in Paris in 1721, was a son of Chancellor de Lamoignon. At the age of twenty-four he was chosen a counsellor in the Parliament, and in 1750 became president of the Cour des Aides. He was directeur de la librairie, or censor of books, from 1750 to 1768, and was praised for his liberality or indulgence by Rousseau, Voltaire, and the Encyclopædists. He acquired great popularity by his defence of the Parliament against the ministry about 1772. In 1775, having been indicated by the public voice, he was appointed a colleague of Turgot in the new ministry, as minister of the king's household and of the police, but he resigned in 1776, when Turgot was dismissed. He was elected to the French Academy in 1775, though he had not produced any purely literary work. He was author of treatises on rural economy and finances, and of a "Memoir on the Liberty of the Press." When Louis XVI. was arraigned by the Convention in 1792, Malesherbes generously offered to him his services as counsel, which were accepted. This act of fidelity having rendered him suspected by the terrorists, he was executed in April, 1794. His virtues are warmly eulogized by both royalists and republicans.

Malet, de, dẹh mă'lą̀', (CLAUDE FRANÇOIS,) a French general and conspirator, born at Dole in 1754. About 1806 he was dismissed from the service, and went to Paris, where he plotted against Bonaparte, and was imprisoned from 1808 to 1812. Having formed another conspiracy, he announced at the barracks, in Paris, on the 24th of October, 1812, that Bonaparte had died in Russia, and that he (Malet) had been appointed governor of Paris by the senate. By forged orders he imposed on the prefect of Paris, made Savary prisoner, and shot General Hullin. At this crisis his audacity was baffled by Laborde, who made him prisoner. Malet and his accomplices were shot, after a summary process, in October, 1812.

Malgaigne, măl'gạñ', (JOSEPH FRANÇOIS,) a French medical writer and surgeon, born in Paris about 1806. He published, besides other works, a "Treatise on Surgical Anatomy and Experimental Surgery," (2 vols., 1838.) Died in 1865.

Malherbe, de, dẹh măl'ạrb', (FRANCOIS,) a distinguished French lyric poet, born at Caen about 1555. He served several campaigns in the civil wars of the League, and married Madeleine de Carriolis in 1581. In 1587 he composed his first work, "The Tears of Saint Peter." An "Ode to the Queen Marie de Médicis" (1600) was the foundation of his fame. He came to Paris a few years later, and enjoyed the patronage of Henry IV. during the life of that prince. Malherbe was called the poet of princes and the prince of poets. He died in 1628. "He was," says La Harpe, "the first [French] model of the noble style, and the creator of lyric poetry. He has its enthusiasm, its movements, and its tournures." "Malherbe," says Hallam, "gave a polish and a grace to the lyric poetry of France, which has rendered his name celebrated in her criticism. In general, we find in his poems neither imagery nor sentiments that yield us delight." Comparing him with Horace, the same critic remarks, "He is far from deficient in that calm philosophy which forms the charm of the Roman poet." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.")

Malibran, măl'le'brŏN', (MARIA FELICITÀ,) a celebrated singer and actress, born in Paris in 1808, was the daughter of Manuel Garcia, a Spanish tenor singer. She made her début in London in 1825, and in 1826 visited New York, where she married M. Malibran, a banker. After he had become a bankrupt, she separated from him and went to Paris, where she performed with complete success in 1828. In Italy, England, and Germany she also obtained triumphs almost unexampled in the history of artistes. Her voice was a mezzo-soprano of great volume. She was very successful as an actress. She died in England in 1836, soon after a second marriage with M. de Bériot, a violinist.

See FÉTIS, "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens;" "Memoirs of Madame Malibran," by the COUNTESS OF MERLIN.

Malik (mâl'ik) or Melik, mêl'ik, El Adel, êl ă'dẹl, I., (Seif-ed-Deen Aboobeker Mohammed, or Saif-Eddyn Aboubekr Mohammed, sīf ed-deen' ă'bōō-bĕk'ẹr mo-hăm'med,) Sultan of Egypt and Damascus, born at Baalbec in 1139, was a brother of the famous Saladin. He gained victories over the crusaders in 1174 and 1187. In 1201 he became Sultan of Egypt. He extended his dominions by conquest in Syria. Died in 1218.

See WEIL, "Geschichte der Chalifen," vol. iii.

Malik-Shâh, mâl'ik shâh, written also Malek-(Malec- or Melek-) Shâh, a famous Seljookide sovereign, the son of Alp-Arslân, whom he succeeded in 1072. Under Malik-Shâh the Seljookian empire reached its highest point of power and glory. His character, like that of his father, appears to have been singularly noble. His succession to the throne had been disputed by his brother Toortoosh, (Tourtousch.) Before giving battle to his rival, he asked his minister, Nizâm-ōōl-Mōōlk, as they came out of the mosque together, what he had prayed for. "I have prayed," answered the minister, "that God would give you the victory over your brother." "And I," said Malik-Shâh, "that God would take away my life and crown, if my brother is worthier to reign than I." Perhaps the only stain upon the character of this great prince is his having, at the instigation of his Sultana, the Khâtoon Tōōrkân, removed from office his minister, the illustrious Nizâm-ōōl-Mōōlk,* to whose wise administration the empire was chiefly indebted for its long-continued prosperity. Nizâm-ōōl-Mōōlk died soon after by the dagger of an assassin. Malik-Shâh survived his minister only a few months. He died in 1092.

"There is no instance," says Sir John Malcolm, "in Persian history, of so vast an empire enjoying so long a period of tranquillity. The kingdom he inherited, which extended from the plains of Tartary to those of Syria, was, during the twenty years of his reign, only disturbed by a short contest with his uncle and brother. . . . Agriculture was promoted, learning was encouraged; an assembly of astronomers from every part of Malik-Shâh's wide dominions were employed for several years in reforming the calendar."

Malinche or Malintzin. See MARINA.

Malingre, mă'lăNGr', (CLAUDE,) a French historian of little merit, born at Sens about 1580. He wrote several works on French history, which were not successful. Died about 1653.

Mallalieu, mal-la-lū', (WILLARD FRANCIS,) D.D., an American Methodist bishop, born at Sutton, Massachusetts, December 11, 1828. He graduated at the Wesleyan University in 1857, became a preacher in the same year, and for some time was presiding elder at Boston. In 1884 he was chosen a bishop.

Mal'la-rў, (CHARLES,) a Baptist minister, born in Poultney, Vermont, in 1801, removed to Georgia. He was one of the founders of Mercer Theological Seminary, at Penfield, Georgia. Died July 31, 1864.

Mallary, (ROLLIN CARLOS,) a lawyer, a brother of the preceding, was born in Cheshire, Connecticut, in 1784. He was a member of Congress from 1819 until his death, in 1831.

Mallemans, măl'mŏN', (JEAN,) a French writer, noted for singular and extravagant opinions, born at Beaune in 1649, was a brother of Claude, noticed below. He wrote a "History of the Church before the Reign of Jovian," (1704,) and other works. Died in 1740.

Mallemans de Messanges, măl'mŏN' dẹh mą'sŏNzh', (CLAUDE,) a French savant, born at Beaune in 1653. He was professor of philosophy for thirty-four years at the Collége du Plessis, Paris. He published "A Physical Treatise on the World," and other works. Died in 1723.

Malleolus. See HAMMERLEIN.

* This name, the only one by which he was known, signifies the "regulator of the state or kingdom."

Mallery, de, dẹh mȧl'rę', (CHARLES,) a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp in 1576. His son PHILIP, born in 1600, was a skilful engraver.

See F. BASAN, "Dictionnaire des Graveurs."

Mallet, mȧ'lȧ', (CHARLES AUGUSTE,) a French philosopher, born at Lille in 1807. He published, besides other works, "Études philosophiques," (2 vols., 1837–38,) which gained a prize of the French Academy. He wrote numerous articles in the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale." Died March 28, 1876.

Mal'let or Malloch, mal'lŏk, (DAVID,) a Scottish poet and dramatist, born at Crieff, in Perthshire, about 1698, was the son of James Malloch. He removed to London about 1724, and changed his name to Mallet. In 1728 he produced "The Excursion," a poem, and in 1731 "Eurydice," a tragedy. He became intimate with Pope, who procured him a situation as travelling tutor. His tragedy "Mustapha" (1739) was performed with applause. About 1740 he was appointed under-secretary to Frederick, Prince of Wales. Among his other works are "Amyntor and Theodora," and a "Life of Bacon." He is censured for acting as the venal agent of Bolingbroke in an attempt to blast the memory of Pope, (1749.) Died in 1765. "As a writer," says Dr. Johnson, "he cannot be placed in any high class. His dramas had their day,—a short day,—and are forgotten: his blank verse seems to my ear the echo of Thomson."

See JOHNSON, "Lives of the Poets;" RUFFHEAD, "Life of Pope;" BOSWELL, "Life of Johnson;" DISRAELI, "Quarrels of Authors;" CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

Mallet, (EDME,) a French littérateur, born at Melun in 1713. He published an "Essay on the Study of Belles-Lettres," and translated into French Davila's "History." Died in 1755.

Mallet, mȧl'let, (FREDRICK,) a Swedish writer on science, born in 1728, was for many years professor of mathematics at Upsal. He published many treatises between 1752 and 1774, and co-operated with Bergman in a general description of the earth. Of this work Mallet wrote the astronomical part. Died in 1797.

Mallet, mȧ'lȧ', (JACQUES ANDRÉ,) called Mallet-Favre, a Swiss astronomer, born at Geneva in 1740, was a favourite pupil of Daniel Bernoulli. He became professor of astronomy at Geneva about 1770, and built an observatory there. He wrote memoirs on astronomy, mechanics, etc. for the Academy of Paris and the Royal Society of London, of which he was a member. Died in 1790.

See PICOT, "Éloge de J. A. Mallet," 1790.

Mallet, (PAUL HENRI,) a Swiss historian, born at Geneva in 1730. He taught French to the Prince-Royal of Denmark, (Christian VII.,) and returned to Geneva in 1760. He was appointed professor of history in the Academy of that city. Among his works (in French) are "Monuments of the Mythology and Poetry of the Celts," (1756,) "Memoirs on the Literature of the North," (6 vols., 1760,) and a "History of Denmark," (3 vols., 1777,) which is highly esteemed and has been translated into English, German, etc. Died in 1807.

His "Introduction à l'Histoire de Danemark" was translated into English, under the title of "Northern Antiquities," which is one of the most valuable works on Northern mythology.

See SISMONDI, "De la Vie et les Écrits de P. H. Mallet," 1807; HAAG, "La France protestante;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale;" "Monthly Review" for March, 1771.

Mal'lęt, (ROBERT,) a British engineer and seismologist, born at Dublin, June 3, 1810. He graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1830. His numerous reports, papers, and catalogues on earthquakes (prepared by him with the aid of his son, Dr. J. W. Mallet) are of high importance. He invented several seismometers. His largest independent work is "First Principles of Observational Seismology," (2 vols., 1862.) Died in London, November 5, 1881.

Mallet-Dupan, mȧ'lȧ' dü'pŏN', (JACQUES,) a distinguished publicist and editor, born at Geneva in 1749. He became a resident of Paris in 1782, and editor of a journal called "Mercure historique et politique," which was very successful. In the Revolution he defended the royalist cause, and in 1792 was compelled to suspend the publication of the "Mercure," of which he had written the political editorials. He then became an exile, and in 1799 began to issue, in London, the "Mercure Britannique," which was ranked among the ablest political journals of that time. Died in England in 1800.

See "Mémoires et Correspondance de Mallet-Dupan," Paris, 1851; SAINTE-BEUVE, "Causeries du Lundi;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale;" "Edinburgh Review" for April, 1852.

Mallet-Prévost, mȧ'lȧ' prȧ'vō', (HENRI,) a scientific Swiss writer, born at Geneva in 1727. He published a valuable "Metrologic Manual, or Repertory of Weights, Measures, and Coins of Various Nations," (1802,) and a "Description of Geneva," (1807.) Died in 1811. He was a brother of Paul Henri Mallet, noticed above.

Malleville, de, dẹh mȧl'vėl', (CLAUDE,) a French minor poet, born in Paris in 1597, was one of the first members of the Académie Française. "He seldom produced a finished piece," says Hallam, "though not deficient in spirit and delicacy." His poems are sonnets, one of which is called "The Fair Early-Riser." ("La belle Matineuse.") Died in 1647.

Mallinkrot, von, fon mȧl'lĭn-krot', (BERNARD,) a German philologist, was dean of the chapter of Münster. He wrote, besides other works, a treatise "On the Rise and Progress of the Art of Printing." Died in 1664.

Mallio, mȧl'le-o, (MICHELE,) an Italian writer of verse and fiction, born at Sant' Elpidio in 1756; died in 1831.

Malloch. See MALLET, (DAVID.)

Mal'lọck, (WILLIAM HURRELL,) an English author, a nephew of the historian Froude, was born in Devonshire in 1849. He graduated with high honours at Balliol College, Oxford. Among his principal works are "Every Man his Own Poet," (1872,) "The New Republic," (1876, a satirical work which for a time attracted great attention,) "The New Paul and Virginia," (1877,) "Is Life Worth Living?" (1879.) "Poems," (1880,) "A Romance of the Nineteenth Century," (1881,) and "Social Equality," (1882.)

Mal'lọ-rў, (STEPHEN R.,) an American Democratic politician, born about 1810. He was elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of Florida in 1850, and re-elected in 1856. He served as secretary of the navy of the Confederate States from March, 1861, to 1865. Died at Pensacola, November 9, 1873.

Malmesbury, EARL OF. See HARRIS, (JAMES.)

Malmesbury, mȧms'bẹr-e, (JAMES HOWARD HARRIS,) third EARL OF, a British Tory statesman, a grandson of the first Earl of Malmesbury, was born in 1807. He succeeded to the earldom at the death of his father, in 1841, before which he was styled LORD FITZHARRIS. In February, 1852, he was appointed secretary of foreign affairs in the Derby ministry, which was dissolved in December of that year. He again became foreign secretary under Lord Derby in 1858, and on the formation of the Liberal ministry in June, 1859, was succeeded by Lord John Russell. He edited the "Diaries and Official Correspondence of the First Earl of Malmesbury," (1844.) From 1866 to 1868 and from 1874 to 1876 he was lord keeper of the privy seal. Died May 17, 1889.

Malmesbury, (WILLIAM OF,) an old English historian, who is supposed to have been born in Somersetshire about 1095. He became a monk in the monastery of Malmesbury, where he held the office of librarian. His principal works are a "History of England from 450 to 1127," ("De Gestis Regum Anglorum,") "Recent History," ("Historia Novella,") wherein he relates events of which he was an eye-witness, and a "History of the English Prelates," ("De Gestis Pontificum.") These are highly prized for accuracy, veracity, and critical judgment. He died in or after 1143.

Malmström or Malmstroem, mȧlm'strŏm, (ELIS,) a Swedish poet, born in 1816. He published a collection of elegies entitled "Angelica," (1840,) and an epic poem of "Ariadne." Died at Stockholm in June, 1865.

Malombra, mȧ-lom'brȧ, (PIETRO,) a Venetian painter, born in 1556. He was successful in portraits and in historical pictures. Died in 1618.

Mą-lōne', (EDMUND,) an Irish critic, chiefly distinguished as an editor and commentator of Shakspeare, was born in Dublin in 1741. Having inherited an easy fortune, he removed to London and devoted himself to literature. He associated with Dr. Johnson, Burke, and other eminent authors. In 1790 he published his edition of Shakspeare, with commentaries. He excelled Steevens, a rival commentator, in candour and love of truth; but "neither seems," says Hallam, "to have had a full discernment of Shakspeare's genius." Malone published an edition of Sir Joshua Reynolds's works, with a Memoir of his Life, (1797,) and other works. He died in 1812, leaving unfinished an improved edition of Shakspeare, since published, (1821.)

See JAMES BOSWELL, "Biographical Memoir of Edmund Malone;" SIR JAMES PRIOR, "Life of Edmund Malone," 1860; "Monthly Review" for September, 1793.

Mal'o-rў, (Sir THOMAS,) a Welsh or English knight, born about 1430. He is noted as the compiler and translator (from the French) of the English "Morte Darthur," begun about 1461 and finished about 1470. He was probably a priest. His book was printed by Caxton in 1485. It is a noble prose epic, and its appearance marks an epoch in the history of English literature.

Malou, mȧ'loo', (JULIUS,) a Belgian statesman and leader of the Catholic party, born at Ypres in 1810; died in 1886. He became minister of finance in 1845.

Malouet or Malhouet, mȧ'loo'ȧ', (PIERRE VICTOR,) a French statesman, born at Riom in 1740. In 1789 he was elected to the States-General, where he became prominent as a liberal royalist and co-operated with Clermont-Tonnerre. He took refuge in England in 1792, returned about 1802, and was chosen a councillor of state in 1810. Died in 1814.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Malouin, mȧ'loo-ăn', (PAUL JACQUES,) a French chemist and physician, born at Caen in 1701. He became professor of chemistry in the Jardin du Roi, Paris, in 1745, wrote many articles on that science for the "Encyclopédie," and published an esteemed work on "Medical Chemistry," (1750.) He was a member of the Academy of Sciences. Died in 1778.

Malpighi, mâl-pee'gee, (MARCELLO,) [Lat. MARCEL'LUS MALPIG'HIUS,] a celebrated Italian anatomist and naturalist, born near Bologna in 1628. Having graduated as a physician in 1653, he became professor at Pisa in 1656, and at Messina about 1664. He published, between 1661 and 1665, treatises "On the Lungs," ("De Pulmonibus,") "On the Tongue," ("De Lingua,") and "On the Brain," ("De Cerebro.") Malpighi was the first who used the microscope in the study of anatomy. In 1670 he returned to Bologna, and wrote an important work on the anatomy of plants, "Anatome Plantarum," (1675,) a science which was first cultivated by Grew and Malpighi. He made discoveries in the structure of the skin and glands. In 1691 he was chosen chief physician to Pope Innocent XII. He died in Rome in 1694.

Malsburg, mâls'bo͝orG, (ERNST FRIEDRICH GEORG OTTO,) BARON, a German littérateur, born at Hanau in 1786, translated Calderon's dramas into German, and published a number of religious poems. Died in 1824

Mâlt'bў, (EDWARD,) an English theologian, born at Norwich in 1770. He became Bishop of Durham in 1836, and published several volumes of sermons. Died in 1859.

See the "Monthly Review" for March, 1820.

Malte-Brun, mault'brŭn' or mȧl'tẹh-brŭn', (CONRAD,) a Danish author and geographer of great merit and celebrity, was born at Thister, Jutland, in 1775. His original name, MALTHE CONRAD BRUUN, (broon,) was changed by the French into Malte-Brun, by which he is now universally known. He had a great facility for learning languages, and wrote French with an ease and elegance which perhaps no other foreigner ever acquired. In his enthusiasm for liberty, he wrote some political articles, for which he was banished in 1796. He composed several admired odes; that on the death of Count Bernstorf is esteemed one of the finest in the Danish language. Induced partly by admiration of Napoleon, he became an adopted citizen of France about 1800. In 1806 he was engaged as one of the editors of the "Journal des Débats" of Paris, for which he wrote, during many years, able articles on foreign politics, history, languages, science, etc. Malte-Brun and Eyriès edited in 1808 the "Annals of Voyages of Geography and of History," ("Annales des Voyages de la Géographie et de l'Histoire.") Before this period he had devoted his attention chiefly to the science of geography, in which he surpassed all his predecessors by his happy union of philosophy with a highly poetic imagination. In 1810 he published the first volume of his great work, "A System of Universal Geography," ("Précis de la Géographie universelle,") the plan of which was too vast for one man to execute The sixth volume was finished in 1825. Exhausted with excessive labour and study, he died in December, 1826, leaving his task unfinished. The language of this work is graphic, picturesque, and at times highly poetical. In order to complete the plan, two more volumes were subsequently added by M. Huot. There is a good English version of Malte-Brun's Geography, by J. G. Percival, the American poet and savant.

See BORY DE SAINT-VINCENT, "Notice biographique sur M. Malte-Brun," 1827; QUÉRARD, "La France Littéraire;" ERSLEW, "Forfatter-Lexicon;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Malte-Brun, (VICTOR ADOLPHE,) a geographer, a son of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1816. He became professor of history at Pamiers in 1838. He published a new edition of his father's Geography, (8 vols., 1852–55.) Died in 1889.

Mal'thus, (THOMAS ROBERT,) an English political economist, distinguished as the author of the Malthusian theory, was born near Dorking, Surrey, in 1766. He graduated as M.A. at Cambridge in 1797, took orders, and settled in a parish near his native place. In 1798 he controverted the theories of Godwin and others on the progress and perfectibility of human nature, in his "Essay on the Principle of Population as it affects the Future Improvement of Society." Much attention was excited by his fundamental principle, that population tends to increase in geometrical progression, and that the supply of food and other necessaries of life can only be increased in an arithmetical progression. After exploring several countries of Europe in search of facts to confirm his system, he published in 1803 an enlarged edition of his essay. His principles were approved by many statesmen and political economists. From 1805 until his death he was professor of modern history and political economy in the college at Haileybury. He was author of an "Inquiry into the Nature and Progress of Rent," (1815,) "Principles of Political Economy," (1820,) and other works. Died in 1834.

Maltitz, mâl'tits, (FRANZ FRIEDRICH,) BARON, a Russian statesman, of German extraction, born in 1794, was appointed minister-plenipotentiary of Russia at the Hague. He was the author of poems and dramas, (in German,) and wrote a continuation of Schiller's "Demetrius."

Maltiz, mâl'tits, (APOLLONIUS,) a littérateur and diplomatist, of German extraction, born in 1795, was ambassador from the Russian court to Lisbon. He wrote tales, plays, epigrams, and poems. Died March 2, 1870.

Maltiz, mâl'tits, (GOTTHILF AUGUST,) BARON, a German writer, born at Königsberg in 1794, published several dramas, and a political satire entitled "Pepper-Corns," ("Pfefferkörner.") Died in 1837.

Mâl'tọn, (THOMAS,) an English geometer and artist, born between 1735 and 1750, lived in London. He published about 1776 a "Complete Treatise on Perspective," which is highly commended. He also published various engravings, designed by himself, among which were "Views of London." Died about 1802.

Maltzan, von, fon mâlt'sân, (HEINRICH KARL ECKHARDT HELLMUTH,) Baron von Wartenburg-Penzlin, a German traveller and ethnologist, born near Dresden, September 6, 1826. He studied law in Jena. He travelled largely in North Africa, Arabia, etc., and published "Three Years in the North-West of Africa," (1863,) "Meine Wallfahrt nach Mecca," (1865,) "Reise in Tunis und Tripolis," (1870,) "Reise in Arabien," (1873,) and other works, containing much valuable linguistic and scientific material. Died by suicide at Pisa, February 22, 1874.

Malus, mȧ'lüs', (ETIENNE LOUIS,) an eminent French optician and military engineer, was born in Paris in 1775. He became a student of the Polytechnic School about 1794, and, aided by the tuition of Monge, made great progress in mathematics. "Of all the pupils who then attended that school," says Biot, "he showed himself the first in application and talents." In 1798 he accompanied as engineer the army to Egypt, and was employed at the sieges of Jaffa, Cairo, etc. He returned to France in 1801, devoted his leisure to analytic optics, and published an excellent "Traité d'Optique." In 1808 the Institute proposed a prize for a memoir on the double refraction of crystals. Malus won this prize, after a multitude of experiments, in which he happened to make one of the most important discoveries of physical science,—viz., the property or phenomenon which he named the "polarization of light." He was elected to the Institute, and in 1811 received the Rumford medal from the Royal Society of London for the discovery just named. He was chosen examiner for physics and geometry at the Polytechnic School. "While thus surrounded," as Biot observes, "with numerous friends who appreciated his genius, honoured with eminent positions to which his talents, services, and probity had raised him, already celebrated for great discoveries," etc., he died prematurely, in February, 1812.

See ARAGO, "Notices biographiques," vol. iii.; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Malvasia, mȧl-vȧ-see'ȧ, (CARLO CESARE,) a learned Italian antiquary, born at Bologna in 1616, was versed in law, medicine, and theology. He became professor of law in the University of Bologna, and published, besides numerous other works, one on the Bolognese painters, "Felsina Pittrice, Vite e Ritratti de' Pittori Bolognesi," (1678.) Died in 1693.

See CRESPI, "Vita di C. C. Malvasia."

Malvenda, mȧl-vĕn'dȧ, (TOMAS,) a learned Spanish Dominican, born at Xativa in 1566, was a good Hebrew scholar. He lived at Rome and Valencia. He wrote a "Commentary on the Old Testament," with a literal Latin version, and a "Commentarius de Paradiso," ("Account of Paradise.") Died in 1628.

Malvezzi, mȧl-vĕt'see, (VIRGILIO,) MARQUIS, an Italian author, born at Bologna in 1599. He served in the Spanish army, and was sent as ambassador to England by Philip IV. of Spain. He wrote, besides other historical and political works, "A Life of Romulus," and a "Life of Tarquin the Proud." Died in 1654.

Malvoisine. See MAWMOISINE.

Mälzel or Maelzel, mĕlt'sẹl, (JOHANN NEPOMUK,) a German mechanician, noted for ingenuity, was born at Ratisbon in 1772. He made an automaton, called the Panharmonicon, which could play many instruments at once, and invented a metronome, which is useful to musicians. He afterwards lived in the United States. Died at sea, July 21, 1838.

Mamachi, mȧ'mȧ-kee, (TOMMASO MARIA,) a monk, born in the isle of Scio in 1713. He went to Rome in 1740, and became professor in the College of the Propaganda. He wrote "On the Oracles of the Heathen," (1738,) and "Christian Antiquities," ("Origines et Antiquitates Christianæ," 4 vols., 1749–55.) Died in 1792.

Mambelli, mȧm-bel'lee, (MARCANTONIO,) an Italian grammarian, born at Forlì in 1582; died in 1644.

Mambrun, môN'brŭN', (PIERRE,) a French critic and Latin poet, born at Clermont-Ferrand in 1600. He became a Jesuit, and taught philosophy at Caen and theology at La Flèche with a high reputation. Taking Virgil for his model, he composed Latin eclogues, an epic poem called "Constantinus," (1658,) and an "Essay on Epic Poetry." His epic obtained a transient favour with the public. Died in 1661.

Mameli, mȧ-ma'lee, (GOFFREDO,) an accomplished poet, called "the Italian Körner," was born at Genoa in 1826, and was killed at Rome in 1849 while fighting the French. The patriotic song "Fratelli d'Italia" is his most celebrated piece.

Mą-mẹr'cus [Gr. Μάμερκος] was tyrant of Catana when Timoleon invaded Sicily in 344 B.C. He formed an alliance with Hicetas and the Carthaginians against Timoleon, by whom he was defeated and executed about 338 B.C.

Mamiani, mȧ-me-ȧ'nee, (TERENZIO DELLA ROVERE,) COUNT, an Italian philosopher and poet, born at Pésaro about 1802. He produced "Nuove Poesie," (1836,) and "Dialoghi di Scienza prima," (1846.) He was minister of the interior and president of the ministry at Rome from May to July, 1848. In politics he was a moderate Liberal, and opposed to the temporal power of the pope, on which he published an able work, "Del Papato," (1851.) He became minister of public instruction under Victor Emmanuel in 1860, was ambassador to Greece in 1861, and minister to Switzerland in 1865. Died in 1885.

Mammæa, mam-mee'ą, or Mamæa, mą-mee'ą, (JULIA,) a Roman lady or princess, born at Emesa, was the daughter of Julia Mæsa, and the aunt of Elagabalus. She became the wife of Gessius Marcianus and the mother of Alexander Severus, whose moral education she guarded with watchful diligence. Severus having been chosen emperor in 222 A.D., she acted as regent during his minority. She and her son were assassinated by the partisans of Maximin in 235 A.D.

See DION CASSIUS, "History of Rome."

Mamoon, Mamoun, or Mâmûn, Al, ȧl-mȧ'mōōn', (Abool- (or Abûl-) Abbâs-Abdallah, ȧ'bōōl' ȧb'bȧs' ȧb-dȧl'lȧh,) the seventh Abbasside caliph, was born at Bagdâd in 786 A.D., and was the son of Haroun-al-Raschid. After defeating his brother Alameen in battle, he ascended the throne in 813. His reign was disturbed by rebellions excited by princes of the race of Alee and others. He enforced by persecution the dogma that the Koran was created and not eternal, which was considered heretical by many of the Moslem doctors. While he was prosecuting a war against the Greek emperor Theophilus in Cilicia, he died, in 833, leaving his extensive empire to his brother Motassem. Mamoon was celebrated as a patron of science and literature, and was praised by Eastern writers for his talents and liberality. He founded colleges, collected Greek and Hindoo manuscripts, which were translated at his expense, and invited the scholars and savants of all nations to his capital, (Bagdâd,) then the great centre of learning and science in the world.

Ma-nas'seh or Ma-nas'sēs, [Heb. מנשה; Fr. MANASSÉ, mä'nä'sä',] a Hebrew patriarch, born in Egypt about 1712 B.C., was the son of Joseph and Asenath. (See Genesis xli. 51.) His descendants formed two half-tribes among the tribes of Israel, one on the east, the other to the west, of the river Jordan.

Manasseh, [Heb. מנשה,] King of Judah, the son of Hezekiah, was twelve years of age when he succeeded his father, in 697 B.C. Having forsaken the true worship and become an open idolater, he was taken captive by the King of Assyria, and detained at Babylon some years. He repented, and was restored to his kingdom. After a reign of fifty-five years, he died, and was succeeded by his son Amon.

See II. Kings xxi. and II. Chronicles xxxiii.

Ma-nas'sēs, (CONSTANTINE,) a Greek writer of the twelfth century, wrote a general chronicle, in verse, from the creation to the year 1081 A.D. It is of some value for the history of the Byzantine empire.

Ma-nas'sēs Ben-Jo'seph-Ben-Is'rael, a learned Jewish rabbi, born in Spain about 1604. He resided mostly at Amsterdam. He wrote, besides other works, "On the Harmony of the Scriptures," ("De Convenientia Locorum Sanctæ Scripturæ," etc.,) and "The Hope of Israel," ("Spes Israelis.") Died in 1659.

Man'by, (Captain GEORGE WILLIAM,) a British officer, born in Norfolk in 1765. Having entered the army, he obtained the rank of captain. About 1808 he invented a mode of saving life by shooting from a mortar a rope to mariners shipwrecked near the coast. Several crews having been rescued by this means, the government provided mortars and other apparatus at numerous stations, and presented to Captain Manby several sums, amounting to £7000. Died in 1854.

Man'chęs-tęr, (Sir EDWARD MONTAGU,) EARL OF, an English general, born in 1602, was the son of Henry, first Earl of Manchester. He was styled Lord Kimbolton before his father's death, (1642.) Having joined the opposition to the court about 1640, he acquired great popularity. In 1642 he was impeached for treason, with Hampden and four other members of Parliament, whom the king attempted to seize in the House. He was appointed a general of the army of Parliament in 1643, and co-operated with Fairfax at the victory of Marston Moor, (1644.) Manchester and Essex were charged by Cromwell with temporizing and with being averse to a decisive victory of the popular party, and the command was taken from them by the "Self-denying Ordinance," (1644.) At the restoration (1660) he was appointed lord chamberlain by Charles II. Died in 1671. "He was distinguished," says Hume, "by humanity, generosity, and every amiable virtue."

See CLARENDON, "History of the Rebellion;" LODGE, "Portraits of Illustrious Personages."

Manchester, (HENRY MONTAGU,) first EARL OF, an English statesman, father of the preceding, was born in Northamptonshire about 1562. He became lord chief justice about 1617, and lord treasurer of England in 1620. He was created Earl of Manchester in 1626 Died in 1642.

Mancini, mân-chee'nee, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian painter, born in the Romagna in 1725. He worked in Rome, and was reputed one of the best painters of his time. Died in 1758.

Mancini, (HORTENSIA,) Duchess of Mazarin, an Italian lady of remarkable beauty, born at Rome in 1646, was a niece of Cardinal Mazarin, who refused to give her in marriage to Charles II. of England, then an exile. She made in 1661 an ill-assorted marriage with the French Duc de la Meilleraie, who then received the title of the Duc de Mazarin. She soon separated from him, and lived many years in London, where her house was the resort of men of wit and pleasure. Died in 1699. According to Macaulay, she was one of the sultanas of Charles II. in the last years of his reign.

See A. RENÉE, "Les Nièces de Mazarin."

Mancini, (LOUIS JULES) See NIVERNAIS.

Mancini, (MARIA,) Princess of Colonna, a sister of Hortensia, noticed above, was born in Rome in 1640, and was a daughter of Cardinal Mazarin's sister. Louis XIV. was so well pleased with her in his early youth that he was inclined to marry her; but Mazarin sent her to a convent. In 1661 she was married to Prince Colonna. She ran away from him in 1672, obtained a divorce, and became a nun. Died about 1715.

See SAINT-SIMON, "Mémoires;" A. RENÉE, "Les Nièces de Mazarin."

Mancini, (MARIA ANNA,) Duchess of Bouillon, a niece of Mazarin, was born in Rome in 1649. She was married in 1662 to the Duke of Bouillon, and became the mother of the Prince de Turenne. She was the first person who patronized La Fontaine the fabulist, who has praised her in his letters. She died in 1714.

See VOLTAIRE, "Siècle de Louis XIV:" A. RENÉE, "Les Nièces de Mazarin."

Mancini, (OLYMPIA,) Countess de Soissons, another sister of the preceding, born about 1642, was married to Eugene Maurice of Savoy, Count de Soissons. She was the mother of the celebrated Prince Eugene, commander-in-chief of the Austrian armies.

Mancini, (PAOLO,) the founder of the Academy of Umoristi, was born at Rome. He was the grandfather of Hortensia and Maria Mancini, noticed above. Died in 1635.

Măn'co Cą-păc' (or mâng'ko kâ-pâk') was, according to tradition, the first Inca of Peru. He instituted the worship of the sun, of which he pretended to be the offspring, founded the city of Cuzco, and gave laws to the natives of that region, whom he found in a savage state. He is supposed to have flourished about 1000 A.D. (See INCA.)

Manco Capac, Inca of Peru, was the son of Huayna Capac. He became heir to the throne after Atahualpa was killed by Pizarro, in 1533. He made a treaty with Pizarro, but, finding himself treated as a captive, he escaped in 1535, raised a native army, and besieged Cuzco. The approach of Almagro forced him to retire. He was assassinated by a Spaniard about 1544.

Mandar, mŏN'dăr', (MICHEL PHILIPPE,) better known as THÉOPHILE MANDAR, a French political writer and revolutionist, born at Marines in 1759. He took an active part in several insurrections in Paris from 1789 to 1793. It is said that in the councils of his party he attempted to arrest the massacre of September, 1792, and proposed a dictatorship for that purpose. He wrote "The Genius of Ages," and other poems, and several political works. Died in 1823.

Măn'dă-ră, [modern Hindoo pron. mŭn'dą-rą,] in the Hindoo mythology, a famous mountain used by the gods in churning the ocean. (See KÛRMA.)

Mandel, mân'dęl, (EDUARD,) a German engraver, born at Berlin in 1810. His portrait of Charles I., after Van Dyck, is esteemed a master-piece. He obtained a medal of the first class at the Exposition of Paris in 1855. Died October 26, 1882.

Mandelot, de, dẹh mȯNd'lo', (FRANÇOIS,) a French fanatic and general, born in Paris in 1529. He was commandant at Lyons, and co-operated with the king in the massacre of the Protestants in 1572. Died in 1588.

Mander, van, vän män'dẹr, (CAREL,) an eminent Flemish painter, poet, and biographer, born at Meulebeke, near Courtrai, in 1548. He received lessons in art from Lucas de Heere of Ghent, and about 1574 went to Rome, where he worked three years and gained a high reputation as a painter of landscapes and of frescos. In 1583 he settled at Haarlem, where he remained twenty years and founded an academy of painting. Among his master-pieces are "Adam and Eve in Eden," and "The Adoration of the Magi." He translated the "Iliad," and Virgil's "Bucolics" and "Georgics." He was author of "Dina," a drama, and of other poems. His best literary work is "Lives of Flemish and Italian Painters," (1604,) which is highly esteemed. Died in 1606.

Mander, van, (CAREL,) a painter, a son of the preceding, was born at Delft in 1580. He worked at the court of Denmark. Died about 1665.

Man'dẹ-vĭlle, de, (or dẹh mȯNd'vēl',) (BERNARD,) an ingenious author, born at Dort, in Holland, about 1670. He became a resident of London, where he practised medicine before he appeared as an author. In 1714 he published a poetical satire called "The Grumbling Hive, or Knaves Turned Honest." This having been censured as immoral by William Law and other writers, he published, with notes, a new edition, with the title of "The Fable of the Bees, or Private Vices Public Benefits," (1723.) It was denounced by the grand jury of Middlesex as a pernicious book. (For an analysis of this remarkable work, see the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale," article "Mandeville, B. de.") He also wrote "Free Thoughts on Religion, the Church, and National Happiness." Died in 1733.

See BIRTH, "Life of Bernard de Mandeville;" "Biographia Britannica."

Mandeville, de, dẹh man'dẹh-vil', (Sir JOHN,) a famous English traveller, born at Saint Alban's about 1300. In early life he practised medicine. According to his own account, in 1327 he went to Palestine, enlisted in the army of the Sultan of Egypt, and afterwards travelled in various countries of Asia. He spent about three years in Cambalu, (Peking,) and returned home in 1360. In point of fact, he probably never went farther east than Jerusalem. He wrote an account of his travels, which obtained a wide reputation. His book abounds in marvellous and extravagant stories, partly borrowed from Pliny and from mediæval romances, and largely made up from the writings of Odoric, Carpini, Boldensele, and other travellers. Mandeville's famous story is in fact a noax. It is said that he died in 1371; but there is really nothing known as to this date. Mandeville is absurdly called "the first English prose writer;" but he wrote in French. The Latin versions, the delightfully quaint (but very inaccurate) old English version, and the Italian translation are by unknown hands.

Mandosio, män-do'sẹ-o, (PROSPERO,) a mediocre Italian writer, born at Rome. He compiled a work called "Bibliotheca Romana," consisting of biographies of about five hundred Roman writers, ancient and modern, (2 vols., 1682–92.) Died about 1700.

Manes. See LARES.

Mā'nēs, Mā'ni, or Manichæus, man-e-kee'us, the founder of the heretical sect of Manichæans, was probably born in Persia in the early part of the third century. He corrupted the Christian religion by mixing with it some doctrines of the Magi, teaching that the world is made or ruled by two eternal and opposing principles of light and darkness. He rejected the Old Testament, professed that he was the Comforter promised in John xvi., held the doctrine of metempsychosis, and published a book which he pretended contained a revelation from heaven. Manes obtained proselytes in Persia, Egypt, and other countries. Saint Augustine was a zealot of this sect in his youth. The Oriental accounts of Manes, differing widely from those of the Greek or Catholic writers, state that he was born of the race of Magi, lived in Susiana, was an adept in painting and other arts, produced a "gorgeous picture-book," which was received as sacred by his disciples, and was put to death by Varanes, King of Persia, about 272 A.D. The Latin and Greek writers say that his original name was CUBRICUS, that he derived his doctrines from an impostor named Terebinthus, and was punished with death for his heresy, in 277 A.D.

Man'ẹ-tho, [Gr. Μανέθων and Μανεθώς; Fr. MANÉTHON, mȧ'nȧ'tȯN',] a celebrated Egyptian writer and priest, was a native of Sebennytus, or, according to some accounts, of Diospolis, and flourished in the reigns of Ptolemy Soter and Ptolemy Philadelphus, between 300 and 250 B.C. He was reputed to have attained the highest possible degree of wisdom. He was keeper of the sacred archives at Heliopolis, and author of several important works, among which was a "General History of Egypt," in Greek. This is lost, except fragments preserved by Josephus in his "Reply to Apion," and by George Syncellus. He was the first Egyptian who wrote in Greek an account of the religion, history, and chronology of Egypt. A poem, in Greek, on the influence of the stars, entitled "Apotelesmatica," (which has come down to us entire,) is sometimes ascribed to Manetho, but was probably written by a later author.

Man'frẹd, [It. MANFREDI, mȧn-frā'dee; Lat. MANFRE'DUS; Fr. MAINFROI, mȧN'frwȧ',] King of Naples, born about 1234, was a natural son of the emperor Frederick II., from whom he seems to have inherited noble or at least popular qualities. By the will of Frederick, who died in 1250, Manfred became Regent of the Two Sicilies until the arrival of Conrad, the lawful heir, who was in Germany. Conrad died in 1254, leaving an infant son, Conradin or Corradino, and Manfred again became regent. A rumour of Conradin's death having obtained credence, Manfred was proclaimed king in 1258, and he refused to relinquish the royal power when that report was proved to be false. He became an ally of the Ghibelines of Northern Italy against the Guelphs. Urban IV., who became pope in 1261, and who had long been an enemy to the house of Suabia, excommunicated Manfred, and offered the kingdom of the Two Sicilies to Charles of Anjou, a brother of Louis IX. of France. Charles accepted it as a fief of the see of Rome, marched an army into Naples, and gained a victory, in which Manfred was killed, in 1266.

Mą-nil'ĭ-ą Gens, the name of a plebeian Roman gens, which was not numerous and consequently was not divided into families. Marcus Manilius, who became consul in 149 B.C., was the first member of this gens that figures in history.

Mą-nil'ĭ-us, (Caius,) a Roman tribune, and partisan of Pompey. He was tribune of the people in 66 B.C. He proposed a bill called "Lex Manilia," granting to Pompey the command of the war against Mithridates in place of Lucullus. On this occasion Cicero uttered his celebrated oration "Pro Lege Manilia."

Manilius, (Marcus or Caius,) a Latin poet, known as the author of an astrological poem called "Astronomica." His name is sometimes written Mallius or Manlius. Nothing is certainly known of his nativity or history; but he is supposed to have lived in Rome in the reign of Augustus or of Tiberius. His poem, first discovered by Poggio about 1410, is a work of much learning, and contains some fine passages, but is faulty in style.

See Scaliger, "Prolegomena in Manilium," 1600; F. Jacob, "De M. Manilio Poeta," etc., 1832.

Manin, mâ-neen', (DANIELE,) an eminent Italian patriot and statesman, born in Venice in May, 1804, was educated for the profession of advocate. He was a republican, and promoted the liberation of Venetia by legal means rather than by arms. In March, 1848, he proclaimed a republic at Venice, and became president of the provisional government. Having vainly opposed the annexation of Venetia to Piedmont, he resigned in July, 1848. He was soon recalled, and governed Venice as dictator during the siege, which lasted a year, and ended, after a heroic struggle, in August, 1849. He went into exile, and died in Paris in 1857. His remains were honoured with a magnificent public funeral, by order of the Italian Parliament, in the metropolitan church of Venice, in March, 1868.

Manin or Manini, mâ-nee'nee, (LODOVICO,) the last Doge of Venice, was born about 1727. He was elected in 1788, a period when the republic manifested evident signs of approaching ruin. He refused to join Austria in a coalition against the French in 1792, and remained neutral in the war that ensued. Venice was invaded by the French in 1797, the form of the government was changed, and Manini retired to private life.

See DARU, "Histoire de Venise."

Manini, mâ-nee'nee, (GIUSEPPE,) an Italian writer on theology and history, was born at Ferrara in 1750; died in 1834.

Man'ley, (JAMES R.,) an American physician, born in the latter part of the eighteenth century, became professor in the Medical College of New York. Died in 1851.

Manley, (JOHN,) CAPTAIN, an American naval officer of the Revolution, born in 1734. He performed several important services. Died in Boston in 1793.

Man'ley, (MARY DE LA RIVIERE,) a popular English authoress, born in Guernsey about 1672, was the daughter of Sir Roger Manley. To procure a subsistence, she wrote "The Royal Mischief," (1696,) a tragedy, which was successful. Her next work was a romance called "Memoirs of the New Atalantis," containing severe strictures on some of the persons in power, which caused her to be prosecuted and imprisoned for libel. She wrote political articles for the Tory ministry between 1710 and 1714, and edited the "Examiner" with ability after Dean Swift had retired from the direction of that paper. She also left an autobiography, and some novels and plays remarkable for their gross indelicacy as well as for their literary power. Died in 1724.

See CIBBER, "Lives of the Poets."

Man'lĭ-a Gens, one of the most ancient and celebrated of the patrician gentes or tribes of Rome. The family names of the Manlii were Cincinnatus, Acidinus, Capitolinus, Torquatus, and Vulso. Among the eminent persons of this gens was Man'lĭ-us Cap-it-o-lī'nus, (MARCUS,) who was elected consul in 392 B.C. In 399 the Gauls under Brennus captured Rome and besieged the Capitol, which Manlius and others defended. According to tradition, an attempt of the Gauls to surprise this fortress by night was defeated by Manlius, who was awakened by the clamour of a flock of geese. For this service he received the surname of CAPITOLINUS. He became a champion of the popular party, or plebeians, in 385, spent his fortune freely for the relief of those who were oppressed by debt, and was accused of aspiring to royalty. His enemy Camillus was appointed dictator, and Manlius, having been tried for treason and condemned to death by the patricians, was thrown from the Tarpeian rock in 381 B.C.

See LIVY, "History of Rome;" CICERO, "De Republica;" AURELIUS VICTOR, "De Viris illustribus."

Man'lĭ-us Tor-quā'tus, or, more fully, Ti'tus Man'lius Capitoli'nus Torqua'tus, a popular Roman hero, was the son of L. Manlius Imperiosus, who was dictator in 362 or 363 B.C. He signalized his filial affection by extorting from Pomponius an oath that he would desist from the prosecution of his father. In 359 he was elected a military tribune. He killed in battle a Gaul of gigantic stature and despoiled him of a chain, (torques,) from which he derived the surname TORQUATUS. He was appointed dictator in 353, and again in 349 B.C. Having been elected consul for the third time in 340, he defeated the Latins, and punished with death his own son, who had violated orders by fighting a single combat with one of the enemy.

See LIVY, "History of Rome," books vii., viii.; AURELIUS VICTOR, "De Viris illustribus;" P. EKERMAN, "Dissertatio de T. Manlio Torquato," 1767.

Manlius Torquatus, (TITUS,) a Roman general, of the same family as the preceding, was consul in 235 B.C. Sardinia having been subjected by him in that year, the temple of Janus was shut, for the second time in the history of Rome, because the Romans enjoyed a universal peace. He was re-elected consul in 224, and made a speech against the motion to ransom the prisoners taken by Hannibal at Cannæ, (216.) In 215 B.C. he gained a decisive victory over the Carthaginians in Sardinia. He was appointed dictator in 208, and died in 202 B.C.

See LIVY, "History of Rome," books xxii., xxiii., xxv., etc.

Man'lius Vul'so, (CNEIUS,) a Roman general, elected consul about 190 B.C. He conquered the Gauls of Galatia, and received the honour of a triumph in 186 B.C.

Man'lў, (BASIL,) a Baptist minister, born in Chatham county, North Carolina, in 1798. He became president of the University of Alabama in 1837. Died in 1868.

Mann, (HORACE,) LL.D., an eminent American educationist, born in Franklin, Norfolk county, Massachusetts, May 4, 1796. His father was a farmer in limited circumstances, so that Horace was obliged to procure by his own exertions the means of obtaining an education. The books to which he had access in early life, as he informs us, "were few, and their contents meagre and miserable." "My teachers," he adds, "were very good people, but they were very poor teachers." There was, however, no lack of hard work, and in summer his labours often encroached upon the hours which should have been devoted to sleep; yet, with all these disadvantages, his mind gave early proof of uncommon power and intense activity. He had earned his school-books, when a child, by braiding straw; and his severe and frugal life gave him the habit of depending solely upon himself for the gratification of all his wants. When about the age of twenty, he commenced the study of Latin, and in six months prepared himself to enter the sophomore class in Brown University, at Providence, Rhode Island, where he graduated with the highest honours in 1819. The subject of his discourse on that occasion was "The Progressive Character of the Human Race." This was always a favourite theme with him, and his first oration may be said to have foreshadowed his subsequent career as philanthropist and statesman. While at Providence he became acquainted with the young lady whom he afterwards married. She was the daughter of Dr. Messer, president of the university. In 1821 he entered the law school at Litchfield, and in 1823 was admitted to the bar. He commenced the practice of law at Dedham. He was elected in 1827 to the State legislature, and during his connection with that body was distinguished for the zeal with which he devoted himself to the interests of education and temperance. In the practice of his profession he had adopted the principle never to take the unjust side of any cause: it is said that he gained four out of five of all the contested cases in which he was engaged. The extraordinary influence which he exerted over the minds of the juries was owing in a great measure to the confidence which all felt in his honesty of purpose. In 1833 he removed from Dedham to Boston, and soon after was elected to the State Senate. In 1836, and again in 1837, he was chosen president of the Senate. About this time he became acquainted with Dr. W. E. Channing and Dr. S. G. Howe, for whom he ever afterwards cherished the sincerest respect and affection.

To his enlightened philanthropy and untiring efforts was due the establishment of the State Lunatic Hospital at Worcester. In 1837 he was elected secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Education, (then recently organized,) and was unanimously re-elected to the same position for eleven successive years. From the moment that he entered upon his new duties, he devoted himself to them with undivided attention and unremitting zeal. By his lectures and writings he awakened an interest in the cause of education that had never been felt before. Through his influence, important changes were made in the school laws of Massachusetts, and a thorough reform was effected in the educational system of the State.

In May, 1843, Mr. Mann married as his second wife Miss Mary Peabody, daughter of Dr. Nathaniel Peabody and sister-in-law of Mr. Hawthorne; and immediately afterwards he sailed for Europe, chiefly for the purpose of visiting European schools, particularly those of Germany. He returned to his native country in the autumn of the same year.

In the spring of 1848, Mr. Mann was elected to Congress, as successor to J. Quincy Adams, who had died in February of that year. His first speech in the House of Representatives was in advocacy of the right and duty of Congress to exclude slavery from the territories. He says, in a letter dated December, 1848, "I think the country is to experience serious times. Interference with slavery will excite civil commotion at the South. Still, it is best to interfere. Now is the time to see whether the Union is a rope of sand or a band of steel." In another letter, dated January, 1850, he says, "Dark clouds overhang the future; and that is not all: they are full of lightning." Again, "I really think if we insist upon passing the Wilmot Proviso for the territories that the South—a part of them—will rebel. But I would pass it, rebellion or not. I consider no evil so great as that of the extension of slavery." On the 7th of March, 1850, Webster delivered his great speech against the Wilmot Proviso. This led to an open rupture between him and Mann. Through the influence of Webster's friends, in the following November Mann failed by a single vote to obtain a re-nomination in the Whig convention. He, however, appealed to the people as an independent candidate, and was triumphantly re-elected.

In September, 1852, Mr. Mann was chosen president of Antioch College, at Yellow Springs, Ohio. On the same day he was nominated for Governor of Massachusetts by a convention of the Free Democracy (otherwise called the Free-Soil party) assembled at Lowell. Although not elected Governor, his popularity was shown by his vote running far ahead of that of the other Free-Soil candidates. He accepted the presidency of Antioch College, which under his able management attained a large measure of success. But the labours and anxieties of that responsible position proved at length too much for his health, never strong, and now undermined by a life of the most intense and unremitting activity. He died August 2, 1859. The immediate cause of his death was doubtless the extraordinary and unceasing mental effort called forth at the college commencement in July, 1859. His address to the graduating class on that occasion* is an eloquent résumé of the great principles by which his life was governed, and forms an appropriate close to the labours of this heroic and gifted philanthropist. His widow survived him many years, dying February 11, 1887.

See "Life of Horace Mann," by his wife, Boston, 1865.

Mann, mȧn, (THÉODORE AUGUSTIN,) ABBÉ, a Flemish writer and antiquary, born about 1740, resided at Brussels. He published a "Tableau of the Coins, Weights, and Measures of Different Nations," (1779,) a 'Description of Brussels," (1785,) and other works. Died at Prague in 1809.

Manne, de, dẹh mȧn, (LOUIS CHARLES JOSEPH,) a French librarian, born in Paris in 1773. He became in 1820 keeper of the Bibliothèque Nationale, in which he classified 300,000 volumes. Died in 1832. His son EDMOND succeeded him as librarian.

Manners, (JOHN.) See GRANBY, MARQUIS OF.

Man'ners, (JOHN JAMES ROBERT,) LORD, a second son of the Duke of Rutland, was born in 1818. He entered the House of Commons in 1841, and identified himself with the Tory party. He was first commissioner of the board of works for a short time in 1858–59, and obtained the same position in the Derby cabinet in July, 1866. He resigned in December, 1868. He was postmaster-general from 1874 to 1880.

Manners, (ROBERT,) LORD, a younger son of John, Marquis of Granby, was a brother of the fourth Duke of Rutland. He died of wounds received at a battle in the West Indies in August, 1782. where he commanded the ship Resolution.

Manners, (ROBERT WILLIAM,) LORD, an English general, born in 1781. He entered the army in 1798, served Wellington as aide-de-camp in the Peninsular war from 1808 to 1813, and was wounded at Waterloo, (1815.) In 1830 he obtained the rank of major-general. He was frequently elected to Parliament. Died in 1835.

Mannert, mȧn'nĕrt', (KONRAD,) a German writer, born at Altdorf in 1756, was the author of a "History of the Vandals," (1785,) "History of Bavaria," (1826,) and other works. Died in 1834.

Manni, mȧn'nee, (DOMENICO MARIA,) a distinguished Italian antiquary and printer, born at Florence in 1690. He published new editions of early Italian works, which he enriched with prefaces, notes, etc., and wrote valuable dissertations on the history of Florence. His "Historic Observations on the Seals of the Middle Ages" (30 vols., 1739–86) is a work of merit. Died in 1788.

See TOMITANO, "Elogio di D. M. Manni," 1789.

Manni, (GIANNICOLA,) an Italian painter, born at Perugia about 1478, was a pupil of Perugino. Died in 1544.

Man'ning, (HENRY EDWARD,) a Roman Catholic prelate, born in London in 1809, graduated at Oxford. He took orders in the Anglican Church, and became Archdeacon of Chichester in 1840. In 1851 he entered the priesthood of the Catholic Church. He was appointed Archbishop of Westminster in 1865. Among his works are "The Unity of the Church," (1843,) and "The Temporal Sovereignty of the Popes," (1860.) He took a prominent part in the Œcumenical Council which held its sessions in Rome from December, 1869, to May, 1870, and he maintained the dogma of papal infallibility. He was created cardinal in 1875.

Man'ning, (JAMES,) D.D., an American Baptist divine, born at Elizabethtown, New Jersey, in 1738, was the first president of Brown University, Rhode Island. Died in 1791.

Manning, (OWEN,) an English antiquary, born in Northamptonshire in 1721. He became Vicar of Godalming and rector of Pepperharrow, (1769.) He wrote the "History and Antiquities of Surrey," and completed Lye's "Saxon Dictionary." Died in 1801.

See W. BRAY, "Life of O. Manning," prefixed to the first volume of his "Antiquities of Surrey."

Manning, (THOMAS,) an English linguist, born in Norfolk in 1774. He resided for a long time in Thibet, and accompanied Lord Amherst to China in 1816. Died in 1840.

Mannini, mȧn-nee'nee, (JACOPO ANTONIO,) an Italian painter, born at Bologna in 1646; died in 1732.

Manno, mȧn'no, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian painter, born at Palermo in 1754; died in 1831.

Mannory, mȧ̃'no're', (LOUIS,) a French advocate, born in Paris in 1696. He published "Voltairiana," (1748,) and "Plaidoyers et Mémoires," (18 vols., 1759.) Died in 1777.

Mannozzi, mȧn-not'see, (GIOVANNI,) an excellent Italian fresco-painter, born at San Giovanni, near Florence, in 1590, was sometimes called GIOVANNI DA SAN GIOVANNI. He was a pupil of Rosselli. In 1621 he went to Rome, where he painted, in rivalry with Guido's "Aurora," a picture of "Night in a Chariot." Having returned to Florence, he painted "The Judgment of Paris," "Aurora and Tithonus," etc. The picture of "The Patronage of the Arts and Sciences by Lorenzo de' Medici" is called his master-piece. Died in 1636.

Mansard or Mansart, môn'sȧr', (FRANÇOIS,) an excellent French architect, born in Paris in 1598. He restored the Hôtel Toulouse, and erected the châteaus of Berny and of Choisy-sur-Seine, and several churches in Paris. The Château de Maisons, a few miles from Paris, is one of his most admired works. His designs are remarkable for nobleness and majesty. He invented the curb-roof called "Mansard." Died in 1666.

See FONTENAY, "Dictionnaire des Artistes."

Mansard or Mansart, (JULES HARDOUIN,) a celebrated architect, born in Paris in 1645, was a son of Jules Hardouin, a painter. His mother was a sister of F. Mansard, noticed above. He studied the art with this uncle, and assumed his name. Having obtained the favour of Louis XIV., he designed the most important architectural works of his reign. He had a rare opportunity to display his genius in the château or royal palace of Versailles, which, though imposing in dimensions and rich in ornaments, fails to satisfy the requirements of good taste. He built the Hôtel des Invalides, —in the grand dome of which he attempted to rival Sir Christopher Wren,—the Château de Marly, the Place Vendôme, and other public works. In 1699 he was chosen superintendent of buildings, arts, and manufactures. Died in 1708.

Man'sel, (Rev. HENRY LONGUEVILLE,) a prominent English writer on metaphysics and theology, logic, etc., was born at Cosgrove, in Northamptonshire, in 1820. He became professor of moral and metaphysical philosophy at Oxford about 1859, and regius professor of ecclesiastical history in 1867. Among his works is "The Limits of Religious Thought Examined," (1858,) which has attracted much attention and no little criticism and has passed through a number of editions. In this treatise he takes as the basis of his argument Sir William Hamilton's position that "the unconditioned is incognizable and inconceivable;" and the work is justly regarded as one of the most important applications of the Hamiltonian philosophy to questions of religion. He edited Sir W. Hamilton's works on logic and metaphysics. He also contributed to the "Encyclopædia Britannica," a valuable treatise on metaphysics, afterwards published separately. He was appointed Dean of Saint Paul's, London, in 1868. Died July 30, 1871.

Mansfeld, von, fon mâns'fêlt, (ERNST,) COUNT, one of the greatest generals of his time, born in 1585, was the natural son of Peter Ernst, noticed below. After fighting for the King of Spain and the Emperor of Germany, he left their service about 1610, and became an enemy of the house of Austria. He avowed himself a convert to the Reformed faith, and in 1618 was chosen general-in-chief of the Bohemian insurgents. In the service of Frederick, whom those insurgents had elected king, he fought many battles, and defeated the Bavarians in 1622. He afterwards marched into Flanders and repulsed the Spaniards at Fleurus. Having raised another army to attack Austria, he was defeated by Wallenstein in 1626, and died near Zara in the same year. He was one of those generals who are as formidable after defeat as before.

Mant, (RICHARD,) an English bishop and commentator, born at Southampton in 1776. In conjunction with D'Oyly, he prepared an edition of the Bible, with notes, (1817.) He became Bishop of Down and Connor about 1823. He wrote, besides other works, a "History of the Church in Ireland." Died in 1848.

See BERENS, "Memoir of the Life of Bishop Mant," 1849.

Mantegna, mân-tĕn'yâ, (ANDREA,) an eminent Italian historical painter and engraver, born at Padua about 1430, was a pupil of F. Squarcione, who adopted him as a son. After he had worked at Padua and Verona, he went to Milan, where he painted the "Triumph of Julius Cæsar," which Vasari esteemed his master-piece, and which was purchased by Charles I. of England. It is now at Hampton Court. He painted several frescos in the Vatican at Rome, and worked some years in Mantua, where he was patronized by the Marquis de Gonzaga. Among his most admired oil-paintings is the "Della Vittoria," (1495,) (a picture of the Marquis of Mantua rendering thanks to the Virgin for his victory at Fornovo,) which still retains its beauty. He was probably the first engraver of his time. Died in 1506.

Mantegna, (FRANCESCO,) an able Italian painter, son of Andrea, noticed above. He was a pupil of his father, and completed several works which the latter left unfinished at Mantua. It is stated that he was the first master of Correggio. Died after 1514.

Mantegna, del, dĕl mân-tĕn'yâ, (CARLO,) an Italian painter, was a relative and pupil of Andrea Mantegna, noticed above. In 1514 he was master of a school of artists in Genoa.

See VASARI, "Lives of the Painters."

Man'tell, (GIDEON ALGERNON,) an eminent English geologist and palæontologist, born at Lewes, in Sussex, in 1790. He adopted the medical profession, which he practised many years at Lewes. A mine near that place offered him a rich field for observations in geology, to which his attention was early directed. He collected from the Wealden formation and the chalk a museum of specimens of extinct reptiles, fishes, and plants, which was afterwards bought by the trustees of the British Museum for £5000. About 1825 he discovered the Iguanodon, an extinct reptile about sixty feet long, and in that year was elected to the Royal Society. He also discovered three other genera of the colossal Dinosaurian reptiles. In 1822 he published "The Fossils of the South Downs." He removed to Clapham in 1839, and a few years later to London. He not only enriched the science by his discoveries, but was unsurpassed by any English geologist of his time as a lecturer and a popular expounder of geological facts. His most important works are "On the Iguanodon," "The Geology of the Southeast of England," (1838,) "The Wonders of Geology," (1838,) and "The Medals of Creation," (1844.) Died in 1852.

Manteuffel, mân'toif'fẹl, (OTTO THEODOR,) BARON, a Prussian statesman, born at Lübben in 1805. He was appointed director in the ministry of the interior in 1846, and minister of the interior about November, 1848. Many of the notes and diplomatic circulars of 1848 and 1849 were written by him. He was president of the council of ministers from December, 1850, to December, 1858. Died November 26, 1882.

See G. HESEKIEL, "O. T. Manteuffel: ein Preussisches Lebensbild," 1851.

Manteuffel, von, fon mân'toif-fẹl, (EDWIN HANS KARL,) BARON, a German general, born at Magdeburg, February 24, 1809. He entered the Prussian army in 1827. He attained the rank of major-general in 1858, and in 1861 was made adjutant-general and lieutenant-general. He commanded a large force of German troops in the Danish war of 1864, a contest which he is believed to have stirred up intentionally. During the Austrian war of 1866 he was actively and successfully employed in Hanover, Saxony, and Franconia; and in the Franco-German war of 1870–71 he was one of the most brilliant corps-commanders. In 1879 he was named imperial lieutenant (or governor) of Alsace-Lorraine, ranking as field-marshal general and adjutant-general of the German army, and as principal aide-de-camp general of the imperial staff. Died June 17, 1885.

Mantica, mân-tee'kâ, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian prelate and jurist, born at Pordenone in 1534, published "Decisiones Romanæ," (1618.) Died in 1614.

Man'to, [Gr. Μαντώ,] a prophetess, daughter of Tiresias, was taken prisoner by the Argives at Thebes, and was dedicated to Apollo, under whose auspices she is said to have uttered oracles at Delphi. She was sometimes called DAPHNE. She became the wife of Rhakius or Rhacius, and the mother of Mopsus.

Man'ton, (THOMAS,) an English divine, born in Somersetshire in 1620. He obtained the living of Stoke Newington in 1643, and afterwards preached at Covent Garden in London. He was eminent for eloquence and learning, and was appointed chaplain to Cromwell in 1653. In 1660 he became a chaplain to Charles II., but was ejected from his church in London for nonconformity in 1662. Several volumes of his sermons, lectures, etc. were published. Died in 1677.

Mantuan, mân-too-ân', or Mantuano, mân-too-â'no, (BATTISTA,) or Battista Spagnuoli, (spân-yoo-o'lee,) a Latin poet, once of great celebrity, was born at Mantua in 1448. He had great facility as a versifier, but was deficient in taste, and his works, consisting of eclogues, silvæ, etc., are now entirely neglected. "He was, and long continued to be," says Hallam, "the poet of school-rooms. Erasmus says that he would be placed by posterity not much below Virgil." He was, however, surpassed as a Latinist by several of his contemporaries. He lived in an age when Latin composition was in great vogue, especially in Italy. He was a Carmelite friar. Died in 1516.

Mantuano, mân-too-â'no, (ADAMO GHISI,) an able engraver, born at Mantua about 1530, was a son of Giovanni Battista, noticed below. He engraved after Michael Angelo, Giulio Romano, and other masters.

Mantuano, (GIORGIO GHISI,) born at Mantua about 1522, was a skilful engraver and painter. He worked many years in Rome, and engraved the finest works of Michael Angelo, Raphael, and other masters. Among them are "The Last Judgment," after Angelo, and the "Holy Family" and "School of Athens," after Raphael. He was living in 1578.

His sister, DIANA MANTUANA, a skilful artist, engraved several works of Raphael about 1570–80.

Mantuano, [Fr. LE MANTOUAN, lẹh mŏN'too'ŏN',] (GIOVANNI BATTISTA BERTANO,) an Italian painter, sculptor, engraver, and architect, the father of the preceding, was born at Mantua about 1500. He was the head of a family which produced several artists, and whose proper name was GHISI. He was the pupil of Giulio Romano. His engraving of the "Burning of Troy" is highly praised.

Man′u-el I. Com-ne′nus, [Gr. Μανουὴλ ὁ Κομνηνός; Fr. MANUEL COMNÈNE, mȧ′nü′ĕl′ kom′nȧn′,] a Greek emperor, born about 1120, was a younger son of John Comnenus, who designated him for his successor. Manuel began to reign at Constantinople in 1143. He was ambitious, brave, and licentious. He is accused of perfidy towards the crusaders Conrad of Germany and Louis VII., King of France, who passed, with their armies, through his dominions in 1147, and with whom he had made a treaty of alliance. He afterwards waged war against Roger, King of Sicily, the Hungarians, and the Turks, over whom he gained several victories. Peace was made between him and Roger in 1155. In 1176 he was defeated disastrously by Az-ed-Deen, the Turkish Sultan, near Myriocephalus, where Manuel fought in person. The Turks were defeated in turn by his army in Lydia, in 1177, when the war was ended by treaty. He died in 1180, and was succeeded by his only son, Alexis II.

Manuel II. Palæologus, (pal-e-ol′o-gus,) [Gr. Μανουὴλ ὁ Παλαιολόγος; Fr. MANUEL PALÉOLOGUE, mȧ′nü′ĕl′ pȧ′lȧ′o′log′,] Emperor of Constantinople, was the second son of John VI., who admitted him as his associate in the empire about 1372. At the death of his father, in 1391, Manuel was held as a hostage by Sultan Bayazeed I. He escaped from Nicæa, and fled to his own capital, in the same year. The enraged Sultan marched against him, and besieged Constantinople. The French and German chivalry came to his assistance with a large army, and forced Bayazeed to raise the siege; but he defeated those allies at Nicopolis (Nicopol) in 1396. The Sultan prosecuted the siege for several years, until the alarming progress of Tamerlane called him away for the defence of his own kingdom. After the defeat and death of Bayazeed, in 1403, Manuel reigned in peace. He died in 1425, aged seventy-seven, and was succeeded by his son, John VII. Palæologus.

Manuel, mȧ-noo-ĕl′, or Manoël, mȧ-no-ĕl′, (FRANCISCO,) an eminent Portuguese poet, born at Lisbon in 1734. He wrote admired odes, sonnets, and epistles, and attained the reputation of the most excellent modern lyric poet of Portugal. Among his poems is an ode to Washington. The liberality of his principles subjected him to a charge of heresy, for which he was summoned before the Inquisition. He escaped, and retired to Paris in 1788. He made admirable Portuguese versions of La Fontaine's "Fables," Châteaubriand's "Martyrs," and Wieland's "Oberon." His poems were published, under the name of "Filinto Elysio." Died in Paris in 1819.

Manuel, mȧ′nü′ĕl′, (JACQUES ANTOINE,) a French orator and republican, born at Barcelonnette (Low Alps) in 1775. In the profession of advocate he attained eminence at Aix. He was a member of the Chamber of Deputies during the Hundred Days, (1815,) when he spoke against the pretensions of Bonaparte and of the Bourbons. In 1818 he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies by the liberals, and was ranked among the ablest debaters of that assembly. "Of all the revolutionary orators," says Lamartine, "he was the most feared and hated by the majority." After a speech in reply to Châteaubriand, he was expelled from the Chamber in 1823. Died in 1827. "He had no one to console him," says Lamartine, "but Béranger, whose heart loved in Manuel the antique stamp of the premature but intrepid, moderate, and upright republican. . . . He was more remarkable for character than eloquence; he preferred action to speech," etc.

Manuel, mȧ-noo-ĕl′, (Don JUAN,) a Spanish prince and author, was a nephew of Alfonso X. of Castile. He was Regent of Castile during part of the minority of Alfonso XI., and distinguished himself in battle against the Moors. He wrote many works, in prose and verse. His political and moral treatise called "The Count of Lucanor" ("El Conde de Lucanor") was esteemed by Bouterwek as the finest monument of Spanish literature in the fourteenth century. Died about 1350.

See LONGFELLOW, "Poets and Poetry of Europe;" TICKNOR "History of Spanish Literature."

Manuel, (LOUIS PIERRE,) a French revolutionist, born at Montargis in 1751. According to Beaulieu, he took a prominent part in the riot of the 10th of August, 1792, and was a partisan of Danton. Soon after this date he conducted the royal captives to the prison of the Temple. He rescued Madame de Staël and Beaumarchais from the massacre of September. As a member of the Convention, he voted against the death of Louis XVI. For this he was proscribed and executed in 1793.

See PRUDHOMME, "Les Révolutions de Paris;" LOUIS BLANC, "Histoire de la Révolution;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Manuel, mȧ′nü′el′, (NICOLAS,) a Swiss artist, author, and Reformer, born at Berne in 1484, was sometimes called DEUTSCH, in Italian TEDESCO, (i.e. the "German.") About 1510 he went to Venice and became a pupil of Titian. He returned to Berne, and painted "The Dance of Death," in fresco. He wrote satirical poems and songs, and "Dramatic Moralities and Mysteries," a humorous composition. In his latter years he held several public offices, and was an active promoter of the Swiss Reformation. Died in 1530.

Manutius, mȧ-nu′she-us, (AL′DUS,) [It. ALDO MANUZIO, ȧl′do mȧ-noot′se-o; Fr. ALDE MANUCE, ȧld mȧ′nüss′,] a celebrated Italian printer and scholar, born at Bassiano, in the Papal States, in 1447. With the patronage of Pico de Mirandola and Alberto Pio, he established a printing-press at Venice about 1490. He invented the form of type called Italic, procured manuscripts from various countries, and published editions of classics which surpassed all others in correctness. About 1500 he formed at Venice a literary association called the Aldine Academy, the design of which was to promote literature by perfecting the copies of the models of antiquity. He compiled a Greek-and-Latin Lexicon, (1497.) Died in 1515.

Manutius, (ALDUS,) or Manuzio, (ALDO,) THE YOUNGER, born at Venice in 1547, was a son of Paolo, noticed below. At the age of fourteen he published a "System of Orthography," ("Orthographiæ Ratio.") He was professor of eloquence at Bologna, Pisa, and Rome. He wrote, besides antiquarian treatises, "The Life of Cosimo I. de' Medici," and "The Accomplished Gentleman," ("Il perfetto Gentil'uomo.") Died in 1597.

See A. RENOUARD, "Annales des Alde."

Manutius, (PAULUS,) or Manuzio, (PAOLO,) an Italian printer, author, and critic, born at Venice in 1512, was a son of Aldus Senior. As the successor of his father in the printing-establishment, he published excellent editions of Latin classics in Venice. About 1562 he removed his press to Rome, whence he returned to Venice in 1570. He acquired a high reputation as a critic and as a writer of elegant Latin. Among his principal works are "On the Roman Senate," ("De Senatu Romano,") "On the Roman State," ("De Civitate Romanâ,") "Roman Antiquities," and a volume of Latin Epistles. "The letters of Manutius," says Hallam, "pall on the reader by their monotonous elegance. . . . Scioppius thinks him consummate in delicacy and grace." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") Died in 1574.

Manzo. See MANSO.

Manzolli, mân-zol'lee, or Manzoli, mân-zo'lee, (PIETRO or PIER ANGELO,) a Latin poet, born at Stellata, on the Po, in Italy, flourished about 1510–40. He was better known by his assumed name, PALINGENIO or PALINGE'NIUS STELLA'TUS. The events and circumstances of his life are unknown. He wrote a long moral poem, entitled "Zodiac of Life," ("Zodiacus Vitæ," Bâle, 1537,) the books of which are named from the signs of the zodiac. "It is not very poetical," says Hallam, "but by no means without strong passages of sense and spirit, in a lax Horatian metre. The author has said more than enough to incur the suspicion of Lutheranism." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.")

See GERDES, "Historia Reformationis;" "Palingène," in BAYLE'S "Historical and Critical Dictionary."

Manzoni, mân-zo'nee, (ALESSANDRO,) a celebrated Italian novelist and poet, was born at Milan, March 8, 1784. His father bore the title of count, and his mother was a daughter of the Marquis Beccaria, the eminent jurist and writer. About 1805 he made a long visit to Paris, where he formed an intimate friendship with Fauriel and produced a poem on the death of Carlo Imbonati, (1806.) He married Henriette Louise Blondel, of Geneva, in 1808, and became a zealous member of the Roman Catholic Church. Soon after this event he produced several hymns on the Nativity, the Passion, the Resurrection, etc., which have much literary merit. His next work was a tragedy, called "Il Conte di Carmagnola," (1820,) in which the three unities are not observed. This drama was warmly applauded by Goethe. He published another tragedy, entitled "Adelchi," and an admirable ode on the death of Napoleon, "Il cinque Maggio." His capital work is the historical novel of "I promessi Sposi," (3 vols., 1827,) an English version of which has appeared under the title of "The Betrothed Lovers." It presents a vivid picture of Italian society of the seventeenth century. The style is natural, eloquent, and beautiful. Manzoni became a senator of the kingdom of Sardinia in 1860. Died May 22, 1873.

Manzoni, (FRANCESCA,) an Italian poetess, born in the Milanese in 1710, was versed in the Greek and Latin languages. Died in 1743.

Manzuoli, mân-zoo-o'lee, (TOMMASO,) an able Italian painter, born near Florence in 1536, was also called MASO DA SAN FRIANO. He adorned several churches of Florence. His master-piece is the "Visitation," which is preserved in the gallery of the Vatican. Died in 1575.

See VASARI, "Lives of the Painters," etc.

Mapes, map, ? or Map, (WALTER,) an old English author, born in the Welsh marches about 1150. He became a favourite of Henry II., who sent him on a mission to the King of France and gave him several benefices. In 1196 he was appointed Archdeacon of Oxford. He wrote satirical Leonine Latin poems, among which is an ode which begins "Meum est propositum in taberna mori." In Latin prose he wrote a curious and interesting work called "De Nugis Curialium." He was the reputed author of several romances in French or Anglo-Norman, among them the "Quest dn Saint Graal," and certain other Round Table legends, which give him a very high rank in mediæval literature.

Maphæus. See MAFFEI and MAFFEO.

Ma'ple-son, (MARIE,) better known by her maiden name of MARIE ROZE, a French singer, born in Paris in 1850. She was educated at the Conservatoire of Paris, and early went upon the operatic stage, where her fine abilities as a singer and her versatility as an actress won her great applause. She married Mr. J. H. Mapleson, a distinguished English manager of the opera.

Mapletoft, mā'pel-toft, (JOHN,) an English physician, born in Huntingdonshire in 1631. He was appointed professor of medicine in Gresham College, London, in 1675. About 1680 he took holy orders. He translated into Latin Sydenham's "Observations," at the request of the author, and wrote "The Principles and Duties of the Christian Religion." Died in 1721.

Mapp, măp, [Lat. MAP'PUS,] (MARC,) a French botanist and physician, born at Strasburg in 1632. He wrote a mediocre "Description of the Plants of Alsace." Died in 1701.

Mappus. See MAPP.

Maquet, mȧ'kȧ', (AUGUSTE,) a French novelist, born in Paris in 1813. He was author in part of "Monte-Cristo," and of other works which were published under the name of Alexandre Dumas. Died January 9, 1888.

Mar, EARL OF. See ERSKINE, (JOHN.)

Mârâ, mâ'ra, a famous dêva of the Hindoo mythology, mentioned in the history of GAUTAMA, (which see.)

Mara, mâ'râ, originally named Schmelling, (ELIZABETH,) a celebrated German singer, was born at Cassel in 1749. She was a pupil of Paradisi, and became the wife of J. Mara, a violoncellist of Berlin. Between 1784 and 1787 she appeared four times as first vocalist at the Handel Commemoration, and was greatly admired. She afterwards performed with applause in Paris and Berlin. She sang in four languages. Died in 1833.

Mara, de, dẹh mȧ'rȧ', (GUILLAUME,) a priest and Latin poet, born in the diocese of Coutances, France about 1470; died about 1530.

Maracci. See MARRACCI.

Maracci, mâ-rât'chee, or Marracci, mâr-rât'chee, (GIOVANNI,) an Italian historical painter, born at Lucca in 1637, was a pupil of Pietro da Cortona. Died in 1704.

Marais, mȧ'rȧ', (MARIN,) a French musical composer, was born in Paris in 1656. Among his works is an opera entitled "Alcyone," (1706.) Died in 1728.

Marais, (MATHIEU,) a French jurist and writer, born in Paris in 1664. He wrote some articles for Bayle's "Historical and Critical Dictionary," and a "Life of La Fontaine," (1811.) Died in 1737.

Marais, des. See REGNIER-DESMARAIS.

Maraldi, mâ-râl'dee, (JACQUES PHILIPPE,) an astronomer, born at Perinaldo, in the county of Nice, in 1665, was a nephew of Giovanni Domenico Cassini, under whom he studied astronomy in Paris. About 1700 he was elected to the French Academy of Sciences. He spent many years in astronomical observations, and in forming a Catalogue of the fixed stars, which he left in manuscript when he died, in 1729.

See FABRONI, "Vitæ Italorum doctrina excellentium;" FONTENELLE, "Éloge de Maraldi."

Maraldi, (JEAN DOMINIQUE,) a nephew of the preceding, was born at Perinaldo in 1709. He became assistant astronomer at the Paris Observatory, and made many observations, which were inserted in the collection of the Academy of Sciences. Died in 1788.

Maran, mȧ'rôn', [Lat. MARA'NUS,] (Dom PRUDENT,) a learned French Benedictine monk, born at Sézanne in 1683. He wrote a "Dissertation on the Semi-Arians," and edited the works of Saint Cyprian. Died in 1762.

Marana, mâ-râ'nâ, (GIOVANNI PAOLO or GIAMPAOLO,) an Italian writer, born at Genoa about 1642. He was imprisoned four years (1670–74) for a political reason. About 1682 he removed to Paris, and obtained a pension from the king. In 1684 he published, in French, the first volume of "The Turkish Spy," ("L'Espion Turc,") which was very successful. "The Turkish Spy," says Hallam, "is no ordinary production, but contains as many proofs of a thoughtful, if not very profound, mind, as any we can find. It suggested the Persian Letters to Montesquieu." He published a second volume in 1686. Died in 1693.

Marangoni, mâ-rân-go'nee, (GIOVANNI,) an Italian antiquary, born at Vicenza in 1673. He wrote a learned treatise on the Flavian Amphitheatre, and "Thesaurus Parochorum." Died in 1753.

Maranta, mâ-rân'tâ, (BARTOLOMMEO,) an Italian botanist and physician, lived at Venosa, in the kingdom of Naples. He assisted Ferrante Imperato in writing his "Natural History," and wrote an esteemed elementary work on botany, entitled "Methodus Cognoscendorum Medicamentorum simplicium," (1559.) "The author," says Hallam, "is independent, though learned, extremely acute in discriminating plants known to the ancients, and has discovered many himself." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") Died about 1554.

See TIRABOSCHI, "Storia della Letteratura Italiana."

Maranus. See MARAN.

Marat, mâ'râ', (JEAN PAUL,) a leader in the French Revolution, was the son of an Italian named Mara, and was born near Neufchâtel, in Switzerland, in 1743. He practised medicine in Paris before the Revolution with great success, becoming in 1777 a court-physician, but in 1786 he resigned his place. He published many treatises on electricity, optics, etc. In 1789 he aroused the populace by his journal "The Friend of the People," ("L'Ami du Peuple.") He was as a consequence for a long time compelled to live in sewers and cellars to escape the officers of the law. Among the Jacobin leaders he appears to have been the most determined and ferocious enemy alike of the royalists and Girondists, whose insincerity he denounced and for whose half-measures he expressed great contempt. In 1792 he was elected to the Convention, and, uniting with Danton and Robespierre, formed the famous triumvirate of the reign of terror. He became a self-constituted public accuser before the commune and the Convention. In May, 1793, the majority of the Convention ordered his arrest for alleged outrages committed against that assembly. He was tried, but was acquitted by the tribunal and brought back to the Convention in triumph. "The hesitation of Danton," says Lamartine, "and the temporizing of Robespierre, raised Marat at this moment to the apogee of his popularity and power. He shrugged his shoulders at the names of Danton and Robespierre, expressing his doubts of their capacity to guide the Revolution." He was assassinated by Charlotte Corday in his own house in July, 1793. (See CORDAY, CHARLOTTE.) Perhaps no man in all history has been more unanimously condemned than Marat. The perfect agreement in regard to his character among his contemporaries of the most diverse and even opposite opinions on other subjects, furnishes the strongest probability that that condemnation was entirely just. That he preferred the gratification of his malignant passions to the pursuit of wealth or of ordinary pleasures is no proof of any very exalted disinterestedness. History furnishes many examples of men who, dominated by one supreme passion, have been indifferent to every other consideration. We find very little force or reason in the recent attempts to rehabilitate the reputation of Marat. The only charitable view of his character that can rationally be maintained is to suppose that his mind, more especially his moral nature, was deeply diseased. For the credit of humanity, we may hope that he was not fully responsible for his conduct.

Maratta, mâ-rât'tâ, or Maratti, mâ-rât'tee, (CARLO,) an Italian painter, born at Camurano, in the March of Ancona, in May, 1625, enjoyed in his time the reputation of being one of the best painters in Europe. He became a pupil of Andrea Sacchi and a devout student of Raphael's works, and chose Rome as his permanent residence. He was employed by Clement IX. and by four other successive popes, and received the title of painter-ordinary to Louis XIV., for whom he painted a picture of Daphne. His Madonnas are admired for modest dignity and amiable expression. He preferred to paint pictures for galleries and altars, rather than large works. Maratta also excelled in the art of etching. He was the last great painter of the Roman school. Died in 1713.

See BELLORI, "Vita del Cavalier Maratti," 1732.

Maratta or Maratti, (MARIA,) a daughter of the preceding, was a painter and a poetess. She was married to G. Zappé, the poet.

Marbach, mar'bâk, (JOHANN,) a German Protestant theologian, born at Lindau in 1521. Among his works is "The Faith of Jesus and of the Jesuits," ("Fides Jesus et Jesuitarum.") Died in 1581.

Marbeau, mâr'bō', (JEAN BAPTISTE FRANÇOIS,) a French writer on social economy, born at Brives in 1798. He founded in 1844 charitable institutions called Crèches, for infants whose mothers serve as labourers out of their own houses. Died October 10, 1875.

Mar'beck, (JOHN,) an English composer of cathedral music, was organist of Windsor in the reign of Henry VIII. He composed the notes to the Preces and Responses used in the English cathedrals. Having identified himself with the Protestant cause, he was condemned to be burned for heresy about 1545, but was pardoned,—perhaps on account of his musical skill. He published a "Book of Common Prayer Noted," (1550,) and a "Concordance." Died in 1585.

Marbeuf or Marbœuf, mâr'bŭf', (LOUIS CHARLES RENÉ,) MARQUIS, a French general, born near Rennes in 1712. He commanded in Corsica against Paoli, by whom he was defeated in 1768. Died in 1786.

Marbois, mâr'bwâ', (FRANÇOIS de Barbé—dĕh bâr'bâ',) MARQUIS, called also MARQUIS DE MARBOIS, a French statesman and writer, born at Metz in 1745. About 1780 he was chargé-d'affaires and consul-general to the United States. In 1792 Louis XVI., who esteemed him for his probity, sent him on an embassy to Vienna. He was elected in 1795 to the Council of Elders, in which he spoke often and with ability. In September, 1797, he was, with others, deported to Guiana by the Directory. Bonaparte appointed him director of the treasury, or minister of finance, in 1801. Marbois was dismissed in 1805, but in 1808 became first president of the Cour des Comptes, (Chamber of Accounts, or exchequer.) He held this office about thirty years. He was keeper of the seals and minister of justice in 1815 and 1816, and received the title of marquis in 1817. He wrote numerous moral, political, and historical works, among which are "The Conspiracy of Arnold against the United States," (1816,) and a "History of Louisiana," (1828.) Died in 1837.

Marbot, mâr'bo', (ANTOINE ADOLPHE MARCELLIN,) a French general, born at Altillac in 1781; died in 1844.

Marbot, (JEAN BAPTISTE ANTOINE,) a general, born at Altillac in 1782, was a brother of the preceding. Napoleon left him a legacy of one hundred thousand francs. Died in 1854.

Marc, the French for MARK, which see.

Marc, mârk, (CHARLES CHRÉTIEN HENRI,) a physician, born at Amsterdam in 1771, settled in Paris in 1798. About 1818 he became physician to the Duke of Orléans, who, on his accession as Louis Philippe, in 1830, gave him the title of first physician to the king. He wrote, besides other works, a "Treatise on Insanity," ("De la Folie," etc., 2 vols., 1840,) and published several able medical treatises. Died in 1841.

Marceau, mär'sō', (FRANÇOIS SÉVERIN DESGRAVIERS,) a French general, born at Chartres in 1769. He entered the army in 1786, and became a general of brigade at the age of twenty-two. In 1793 he obtained the chief command of the army sent against the Vendeans, whom he defeated at Mans. In 1795 and 1796 he commanded a division on the Rhine and in the Palatinate, where he gained advantages over the Austrians. He was killed in battle near Altenkirchen in 1796. Kléber, who was his friend, said, "I have never known any general so capable as Marceau to change the plan of battle on the spot with sang-froid and judgment."

Marcel. See MARCELLUS I., Bishop of Rome.

Marcel, mär'sĕl', (ETIENNE,) a French partisan chief and agitator of reform, was provost of the merchants of Paris when King John was defeated and made prisoner at Poitiers, in 1356. He became the leader of the popular party in its contest with the dauphin Charles, who acted as regent. Marcel was predominant in Paris, and controlled a majority in the States-General, which refused to vote supplies for the war unless their grievances should be redressed. A revolution was effected which rendered the government almost republican. Having given the command of Paris to Charles the Bad, of Navarre, he was betrayed by him, and was assassinated in 1358.

Marcel, (GUILLAUME,) a French chronologist, born at Toulouse in 1647. He negotiated a treaty with the Dey of Algiers in 1677. He published valuable "Chronological Tablets," and a "History of the Origin and Progress of the French Monarchy," (1686,) which is commended for accuracy in dates. Died in 1708.

Marcel, (GUILLAUME,) a French writer and priest, born about 1612. He wrote Latin and French verse, etc. Died in 1702.

Marcel, (JEAN JOSEPH,) an eminent French Orientalist and historian, born in Paris in November, 1776. He went to Egypt in 1798 as a member of the scientific commission, and, having returned to France in 1801, was selected as one of the rédacteurs of the "Description of Egypt." He was director of the national printing department (imprimerie) from 1802 to 1814. Among his numerous works are "Mélanges Orientaux," (1833,) a "History of Egypt from the Arabian Conquest to the French Expedition," (2d edition, 1844,) and a "Scientific and Military History of the French Expedition in Egypt," (with Louis Reybaud,) (10 vols., 1830–36.) Died in 1854.

Marcellis, mar-sel'lis, (OTHO,) a Dutch painter of flowers and animals, was born in 1613. He worked with success in Paris, Rome, and Amsterdam. Died in 1673.

Marcello, mar-chel'lo, (BENEDETTO,) a celebrated Italian composer and poet, born of a patrician family at Venice in 1686, was a pupil of Gasparini. He studied law, and was for fourteen years a member of the Council of Forty. He gained distinction as a poet by a number of sonnets and canzoni. His capital work is a collection of psalms, entitled "Estro poetico-armonico Parafrasi sopra i 50 primi Salmi," (1724.) These were received with universal enthusiasm throughout Europe, and merited for the author the appellation of the Pindar and Michael Angelo of musicians. Died in 1739.

Marcello, (PIETRO,) an Italian biographer, lived at Venice about 1500, and wrote "De Vita Principum et Gestis Venetorum," (1554.)

Mar-cel'lus [Fr. MARCEL, mär'sĕl'; It. MARCELLO, mar-chel'lo] I., Bishop of Rome, was a Roman by birth, and was elected in 308 A.D. His efforts to maintain strict discipline are said to have caused a schism and sedition among the believers. He died in 309 or 310, and was succeeded by Eusebius.

Marcellus II., POPE, born at Fano in 1501, was named MARCELLUS CERVIUS. He was elected pope in April, 1555, after the death of Julius III. About three weeks after his election he died, and was succeeded by Paul IV.

See A. BOWER, "History of the Popes;" ARTAUD DE MONTOR, "Histoire des souverains Pontifes Romains."

Mar-cel'lus, (CAIUS CLAUDIUS,) a Roman consul, who married Octavia, the sister of Octavius Cæsar. He became consul in 50 B.C., before which he had attached himself to the party of Pompey. While in this office he made a motion in the senate to deprive Cæsar of his command, but did not succeed. He remained in Italy during the civil war, and shared the clemency of Cæsar after the victory of the latter. Died about 40 B.C.

Mar-cel'lus, [It. MARCELLO, mar-chel'lo,] (DONATO,) an Italian physician, born at Mantua. He wrote "De Historia Medica mirabili," (1586.)

Marcellus, (MARCUS CLAUDIUS,) a Roman general, celebrated as the conqueror of Syracuse, born about 266 B.C., was the greatest member of a consular plebeian family which produced several eminent men. In 222 he became consul, (with Cn. Cornelius Scipio,) defeated the Insubrians on the Po, and obtained the honour of a triumph. After Hannibal had invaded Italy in the second Punic war, Marcellus was chosen prætor for the year 216 B.C., in which the battle of Cannæ was fought. He was not present at this battle. The command of the forces which escaped from that defeat having devolved on him, he repulsed the attack of Hannibal on Nola, and was the first that checked his victorious progress. He was elected for the third time consul for the year 214, with the great Fabius Maximus as his colleague. His most famous exploit was the conquest of Syracuse, which, though defended by the genius of Archimedes, he took, after a siege of two years and some months, in 212 B.C. He again obtained the consulship in 210 B.C., with the command of the army in Italy, and fought an indecisive battle with Hannibal at Numistro. Marcellus and Hannibal commanded the respective armies at Canusium, (209,) where the Romans claimed the victory. Marcellus was elected consul for the fifth time in 208 B.C. Having advanced to reconnoitre near Venusia, he fell into an ambuscade, and was killed in the skirmish with the advanced posts of Hannibal, in that year. Plutarch has drawn a parallel between Marcellus and Pelopidas, "who," he says, "were both men of heroic strength, and were equal in courage and magnanimity." Polybius denies that Marcellus ever defeated Hannibal.

See PLUTARCH's "Lives;" AURELIUS VICTOR, "De Viris illustribus;" LIVY, "History of Rome," books xxii.–xxvii.; POLYBIUS, "History;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Marcellus, (MARCUS CLAUDIUS,) a Roman general, was a son of the preceding. He was wounded in the skirmish in which his father was killed. He was elected prætor in 198 B.C., and consul in 196, when he commanded in Cisalpine Gaul and defeated the Insubrians. In 189 he was censor. Died in 177 B.C.

Marcellus, (MARCUS CLAUDIUS,) a son of the preceding, obtained the consulship in 166 B.C. He was chosen consul again in 155, and gained a victory over the Ligurians. In 152 he obtained a third consulship, with command of the army in Spain, where he subdued the Celtiberians and founded Corduba, (Córdova.) He perished by shipwreck in 148 B.C.

Marcellus, (MARCUS CLAUDIUS,) the friend of Cicero, and the subject of the admirable oration "Pro M. Marcello," was a descendant of the great Marcellus. He had a high reputation as an orator. Elected consul in 52 B.C., he urged the senate to extreme measures against Cæsar. In the civil war he was an adherent of Pompey and the senate. He fled from Rome in 49, and joined the army in Epirus. After the ruin of his cause at Pharsalia, he exiled himself to Mitylene. Overcome by the warm intercession of the senators, Cæsar granted him a pardon in 47 B.C. On this occasion Cicero expressed his thanks to the dictator, and his high estimate of the merit of Marcellus, in the oration which bears his name. Marcellus was on his homeward journey when he was assassinated, near Athens, by P. Magius, one of his attendants, about 46 B.C.

See CICERO, "Pro M. Marcello;" DRUMANN, "Geschichte Roms;" ORELLI, "Onomasticon Tullianum."

Marcellus, (MARCUS CLAUDIUS,) was the son of C. Claudius Marcellus, noticed above, and Octavia. About the year 25 B.C. he was adopted by his uncle, the emperor Augustus, who gave him his daughter Julia in marriage. He was a youth of promising talents, and was a general favourite. He died in his twentieth year, in the autumn of 23 B.C. His memory was embalmed by Virgil in a beautiful passage of his epic poem, (book vi., v. 872, etc.,) which was recited by the poet in the presence of Octavia and Augustus. (See OCTAVIA.)

See PLUTARCH, "Marcellus;" TACITUS, "Annales."

Mar-cel'lus Em-pi'ĭ-cus, a Latin writer, born at Burdigala, (Bordeaux.) He was magister officiorum in the reign of Theodosius the Great, (379–395 A.D.) He was author of a pharmaceutical work, "De Medicamentis Empiricis, Physicis," etc.

Mar-cel'lus Si-de'tēs, a native of Side, in Pamphylia, lived about 140 A.D. He wrote a long Greek medical poem, of which fragments are extant.

Mar-cel'lus Ul'pĭ-us, a Roman jurist, who flourished about 150 A.D., and was a legal adviser of the emperor Antoninus Pius. He was author of thirty-one books of "Digesta," six books on the "Leges Julia et Papia," and one book of "Responsa." About one hundred and fifty excerpts from his works are found in the "Digest." He is often quoted as high authority by Ulpian, Paulus, and other jurists.

Marculfe, mar'kulf, a French monk, who is supposed to have lived about 650 A.D. He formed a collection of formulas of contracts, deeds, and public acts which were used and approved in his time. This collection is valued as a monument of French history and jurisprudence.

Mar'cus, [Fr. MARC, mȧrk,] a native of Rome, was elected Pope or Bishop of Rome, in place of Sylvester, in 336 A.D. He died about nine months after his election, and was succeeded by Julius I.

Marcus Aurelius. See AURELIUS ANTONINUS.

Mar'cus Græ'cus (gree'kus) passes for the author of a Latin work on the art of destroying enemies by fire, ("Liber Ignium ad Comburendos Hostes,") a manuscript of which is said to be found in the Royal Library of Paris. No ancient writer mentions him, and nothing is known of his history. G. Fournier (of the "Biographie Universelle") conjectures that he wrote near the close of the thirteenth century, and thinks the "Liber Ignium" is a rather bad version of a Greek original. "It is a tissue of errors," he adds, "and a collection of recipes, one or two of which give almost exactly the composition of gunpowder."

Mar'cy, (OLIVER,) LL.D., an American instructor, born in Coleraine, Massachusetts, February 13, 1820. He graduated at Wesleyan University in 1846. In 1862 he became professor of natural history in the University at Evanston, Illinois, and acted as its president from 1876 to 1881. He was for some time a geologist in the United States territorial surveys.

Mar'cy, (RANDOLPH B.,) an American general, born in Massachusetts about 1812, graduated at West Point in 1832. He became a captain in 1846, and colonel in 1861. He served as chief of staff of the army of the Potomac in 1862, under General McClellan, was brevetted brigadier-general and major-general in 1865, and became inspector-general in 1878. Died November 22, 1887.

Marcy, (WILLIAM L.,) a distinguished American statesman of the Democratic party, born at Southbridge, Massachusetts, in 1786. Having graduated at Brown University in 1808, he studied law at Troy, New York. He entered the army as lieutenant on the breaking out of the war of 1812, and distinguished himself in several engagements in Canada. About 1820 he became editor of the "Troy Budget," a Democratic journal, and in 1823 was elected comptroller of the State. He became a United States Senator in 1831, and was chosen Governor of New York in 1832, 1834, and 1836. He was a candidate in 1838, but was defeated by Mr. Seward. He was appointed by President Polk secretary of war in March, 1845, and displayed much ability in this position, which was rendered more arduous by the occurrence of the Mexican war. He retired from office in March, 1849, after which he passed four years in private life. He supported General Cass in the Presidential election of 1848, and was secretary of state in the cabinet of President Pierce from March 4, 1853, to March 4, 1857. During this period he gained a high reputation as a diplomatist. He died at Ballston Spa on the 4th of July, 1857.

Mar-dō'nĭ-us, [Gr. Μαρδόνιος,] an able Persian general, was a son-in-law of Darius Hystaspes. In 492 B.C. he commanded a large armament sent by Darius against the Grecian states. Having lost a great part of his fleet in a storm, he returned without success. In 481 he held a high command in the expedition which Xerxes led against the Greeks. After the Persians had been defeated at Salamis, (480 B.C.,) Xerxes returned home, leaving 300,000 men under Mardonius, who captured Athens without much resistance. He was defeated and killed at Platæa in 479 B.C. by the army of Pausanias.

Marduk, a great deity of the old Babylonians, identified by the Greeks with Zeus, but in many respects resembling Mercury. The planet Mercury was also called Marduk.

Mare, de la, dẹh lȧ mȧr, (NICOLAS,) a French magistrate, born near Paris in 1639. He wrote a "Treatise on the Police," ("Traité de la Police," 4 vols., 1707–38.) Died in 1723.

Marestier, mȧ′rĕs′te-ā′, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) an able French engineer and naval architect, born at Saint-Servan about 1780. He constructed the first steamboat used by the military marine for the service of seaports. He published a "Treatise on the Steamboats of the United States," etc., (1824.) Died in 1832.

Maret, mȧ′rȧ′, (HUGUES,) a learned French physician and writer, born at Dijon in 1726. He was a corresponding member of the Academy of Sciences, Paris, and a friend of the celebrated chemist Guyton de Morveau. One of his sons was the Duke of Bassano, noticed below. Died in 1786.

Maret, (HUGUES BERNARD,) Duke of Bassano, an able French statesman and diplomatist, born at Dijon in 1763. He studied law in Paris, and in 1789 reported the debates of the National Assembly in a daily "Bulletin." This was soon united with the "Moniteur," which owed its success to the reports of Maret. Under the new régime he was rapidly advanced in the department of foreign affairs, and was sent on missions to England and Naples in 1793. On his way to Naples he was arrested by the Austrians, and confined in a dungeon about two years. From 1800 to 1811, as secretary-general, or secretary of state, he directed the home department with great credit, had a large share of Bonaparte's confidence, and accompanied him in his campaigns. In 1811 he was appointed minister of foreign affairs, and received the title of Duke of Bassano. On the return of Bonaparte from Elba, Maret became again his secretary. He was restored to the rank of a peer of France in 1831, and in 1834 was minister of the interior for a short time. He had been admitted into the Institute (Académie Française) in 1803. Died in 1839.

Mar′ga-ret OF ANJOU, [Fr. MARGUERITE D'ANJOU, mȧR′grĕt′ dôN′zhoo′,] a daughter of René of Anjou, Duke of Lorraine, was born in Lorraine in 1429. She was married in 1445 to Henry VI., King of England, and, in consequence of his imbecility, had the principal share in the government. In the ensuing contest between the houses of York and Lancaster, her troops were several times victorious over the former; but they suffered a fatal defeat at Towton in 1461. After several unsuccessful efforts to repair her fortunes, Margaret was again defeated and made a prisoner at Tewksbury by Edward IV. in 1471. She was ransomed by the French king, Louis XI., and passed the remainder of her life in France, where she died in 1481.

Margaret OF AUSTRIA, [Ger. MARGARETHE VON OESTREICH, maR-gȧ-rā′tęh fon öst′rĪK,] daughter of Maximilian, Emperor of Germany, and Mary of Burgundy, was born at Ghent in 1480. She was betrothed when a child to Charles VIII. of France. But he refused to keep the engagement, and married in 1491 Anne, the heiress of Brittany. Margaret was married in 1497 to Don Juan, Infant of Spain, son of Ferdinand and Isabella, who survived but a few months. She was again married in 1501 to Philibert the Handsome, Duke of Savoy, who died in 1505. In 1517 Margaret was appointed by her father ruler of the Netherlands, in which post she displayed signal ability. She had a part in the League of Cambray, formed in 1508 by the principal European powers against Venice. She died in 1530, leaving a number of works in prose and verse, including her "Correspondence," which was published in 1839, (2 vols.)

Margaret OF AUSTRIA. Duchess of Parma, born at Brussels in 1522, was a natural daughter of Charles V., Emperor of Germany. She was married in 1533 to Alessandro de' Medici, Duke of Florence, and after his death to Ottavio Farnese, Duke of Parma. In 1599 she was appointed Governor of the Netherlands by Philip II. of Spain. This difficult post she occupied till 1567, when she resigned it to the Duke of Alva. The celebrated Alexander Farnese, afterwards Dûke of Parma, was her son and only child.

Margaret, [Danish, MARGARETHE, maR-gȧ-rā′tęh,] daughter of Waldemar III., King of Denmark, born at Copenhagen in 1353, was married in 1363 to Haquin, King of Norway. In 1376 she was appointed Regent of Denmark during the minority of her son Olaus, then but five years old. On the death of Haquin, in 1380, she became Queen of Norway, and, her son dying in 1387, the Danes also acknowledged her as their sovereign. Soon after this, Margaret engaged in a war with Albert, King of Sweden, against whom his subjects had rebelled. Her army defeated the Swedes and captured Albert, (1388,) who obtained his liberty only by renouncing the crown of Sweden. At an assembly of the estates of the three kingdoms, held at Calmar in 1397, the famous treaty called "the Calmar Union" was formed. By this it was agreed that Sweden, Denmark, and Norway should in future be united under one sovereign, and Eric VII., nephew of Margaret, was appointed her successor. Died in 1411.

Margaret OF FRANCE, or OF VALOIS, [Fr. MARGUERITE DE VALOIS, mȧR′grĕt′ dęh vȧl′wȧ′,] a daughter of Henry II. and Catherine de Médicis, was born in 1553. She had respectable talents, but little virtue. In 1572 she was married to Henry of Navarre; but love apparently had no part in this fatal alliance. During the festivities that followed the marriage, the perfidious court of Charles IX. ordered the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew. She had lived separately from her husband some years before he became Henry IV. of France, and their union was formally dissolved about the year 1600. Died in 1615.

Margaret, Queen of Navarre, originally Margaret of Angoulême, [Fr. MARGUERITE D'ANGOULÊME, mȧR′grĕt′ dôN′goo′lĕm′,] daughter of Charles, Count of Angoulême, and Louise of Savoy, and sister of Francis I., was born in 1492. She was married in 1509 to Charles, Duke of Alençon, who died in 1525, and in 1527 she became the wife of Henry d'Albret, King of Navarre. She was distinguished for her beauty, talents, and superior culture, and exercised great influence in the government of her brother, Francis I., to whom she was warmly attached. The mildness and toleration she displayed towards the Protestants, and particularly her protection of Calvin, brought upon her the imputation of heresy from the Catholic party. She was the author of numerous works in prose and verse, among which may be named the "Heptameron," a collection of tales in the style of Boccaccio's "Decamerone," and a devotional treatise entitled "Mirror of the Sinful Soul." She died in 1549, leaving a daughter, Jeanne d'Albret, afterwards the mother of Henry IV. of France.

Maria Louisa, mą-rī′ą loo-ee′zą, [Fr. MARIE LOUISE, mȧ′re′ loo′ēz′,] daughter of the emperor Francis I. of Austria and Maria Theresa of Naples, was born at Vienna in 1791. She was married in 1810 to Napoleon I., Emperor of France, to whom she bore a son in March, 1811. On the abdication of Napoleon, in 1814, she retired to Vienna, and in 1816 the allied powers gave her the duchy of Parma. She was privately married to Count Neipperg, her chamberlain. Died in 1847.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Maria Louisa Augusta, (CATHERINE,) Empress of Germany, was a daughter of Charles Frederick, Grand-Duke of Saxe-Weimar, and grand-daughter of Paul I., Czar of Russia. She was born September 30, 1811, and in her youth was associated with Goethe at Weimar. In 1829 she married William, the future king of Prussia, and the first emperor of Germany in the new régime. The empress Augusta was noted for benevolence, and for her love of art and letters. Died January 7, 1890.

Maria Theresa, mȧ-ree′ȧ tȧ-rā′sȧ, [Fr. MARIE THÉRÈSE, mȧ′re′ tȧ′rȧz′,] daughter of Philip IV. of Spain, was married in 1660 to Louis XIV. of France. (See LOUIS XIV.)

Maria Theresa, mȧ-rī′ȧ te-ree′sȧ, [Fr. MARIE THÉRÈSE, mȧ′re′ tȧ′rȧz′; It. MARIA TERESIA, mȧ-ree′ȧ tȧ-rā′se-ȧ,] daughter of Charles VI., Emperor of Germany, and Elizabeth Christina of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel, was born in May, 1717. She was married in 1736 to Francis, Duke of Lorraine. Charles VI., who died in 1740, appointed her heir to his hereditary thrones, in accordance with the act called the Pragmatic Sanction, but her claims were disputed by the Electors of Saxony and Bavaria and by the Kings of Prussia, Spain, and Sardinia, each of whom claimed some portion in the name of the Austrian princesses with whom they were connected. Maria Theresa immediately repaired to Vienna, where she received the homage of the Austrian states, and thence proceeding to Presburg was crowned Queen of Hungary in 1741. She received offers of assistance from Frederick II. of Prussia on condition of her ceding to him Lower Silesia, but she firmly refused. Her capital being soon after threatened with a siege by the Elector of Bavaria and his French allies, the queen convoked the Hungarian Diet at Presburg, where, with her infant children, she said to the deputies that, "being assailed by enemies on every side, she had no hopes except in their loyalty, and she had come to place under their protection the daughter and son of their kings." The Hungarian nobles responded with enthusiasm to this appeal, and drew their swords, exclaiming, "We will die for our king, Maria Theresa!" ("Moriamur pro rege nostro, Maria Theresia!") The French and Bavarians were soon driven out of her hereditary states by the forces under General Kevenhuller and Prince Charles of Lorraine. In 1742 a treaty of peace was concluded between Maria Theresa and the King of Prussia, by which the latter obtained Silesia. The Elector of Bavaria, who had been previously chosen Emperor of Germany under the name of Charles VII., having died in 1745, Francis, the husband of Maria Theresa, was elected to that dignity. In 1746 the Imperialists gained important victories in Italy, and defeated the French and Spaniards at Piacenza. The peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748, put an end to the war of the Austrian succession, leaving the empress in possession of all her hereditary estates except Silesia. The Seven Years' war, carried on by Prussia against France, Russia, and Austria, terminated in 1763, leaving the boundaries of Austria and Prussia the same as before. The emperor Francis having died in 1765, his son Joseph was elected Emperor of Germany; but Maria Theresa still retained the principal share in the government of her hereditary dominions. She is said to have refused to take any part in the partition of Poland (1772) until prevailed upon by the representations of Joseph II. and Prince Kaunitz. Among the important reforms of her reign was the abolition of the torture (1776) and of feudal service. She also abolished the Inquisition at Milan, and suppressed the order of Jesuits. She died in November, 1780, and was succeeded by her son, Joseph II., as King of Hungary.

Ma-rĭ-am′ne, [Gr. Μαριάμνη,] a beautiful Jewess, a granddaughter of the high-priest Hyrcanus II., became in 38 B.C. the wife of Herod the Great, who, when he departed from his capital to meet Octavian, gave secret orders that she should be put to death in case he did not return in safety. This secret having been revealed to her, she received him coldly on his return, and excited his jealousy, which was increased by the intrigues of Herod's sister Salome, who suborned the royal cupbearer to testify that Mariamne designed to poison the king. She was put to death in 29 B.C. This story is the subject of one of Voltaire's tragedies.

Mariana, de, dȧ mȧ-re-ȧ′nȧ, (JUAN,) an eminent Spanish historian, born at Talavera in 1536. He studied at Alcalá, and, having entered the order of Jesuits, was appointed professor of theology in their college at Rome, (1560.) He returned to Spain in 1574, where he passed the remainder of his life in retirement, devoted to literary pursuits. He published in 1599 his "Treatise on Royalty," ("De Rege et Regis Institutione,") in which he maintains that it is lawful in certain cases to put a king to death. This work caused a great sensation, particularly in France, where it was denounced by the Sorbonne, and soon after the assassination of Henry IV. it was publicly burned by order of the Parliament. In 1592 he brought out his great work entitled "Historia de Rebus Hispaniæ," ("History of Spain,") which was received with great favour and was soon after translated by him into Spanish. His Latin style is characterized by great elegance and animation, and has been compared to that of Livy; while his Spanish history is generally esteemed the most admirable work of the kind in the language. "Noble, pure, and rich without diffuseness, it unites with rare felicity," says a French critic, "the picturesque vivacity of the chroniclers with the dignity of history;" and Ticknor, in his "History of Spanish Literature," observes, "Its admirably idiomatic style, so full yet so unencumbered, so pure and yet so rich, renders it, if not the most trustworthy of annals, at least the most remarkable union of picturesque chronicling with sober history that the world has ever seen." Mariana also published a treatise "On Weights and Measures," "On Death and Immortality," and other learned works, in Latin, and an essay entitled "De las Enfermedades de la Compañia y de sus Remedios," ("On the Disorders of the Society [of Jesuits] and their Remedies," 1625,) in which he boldly exposes and condemns the errors of the Jesuits. Died in 1623.

Mărîchĭ, mȧ-ree′chĭ, a celebrated Hindoo sage or demi-god, was, according to one account, the son of Brahma,—according to another, the son of Bhrigu. He was the father of Kasyapa. By some he is considered as the god of "light," which appears to be the etymological signification of his name.

Marie, the French for MARY, which see.

Marie, mȧ'rē', (ALEXANDRE THOMAS,) a French advocate and republican, born at Auxerre in 1795. He was minister of public works from February to June, 1848, and minister of justice from July to December of that year. He was elected to the Corps Législatif in 1863. Died in 1870.

Marie Adélaïde de Savoie, mȧ'rē' ȧ'dȧ'lȧ'ēd' dẹh sȧ'vwȧ', daughter of Victor Amadeus, Duke of Savoy, born at Turin in 1685, was married in 1697 to the Duke of Burgundy, grandson of Louis XIV. of France. She died in 1712, leaving one son, afterwards Louis XV.

Marie Amélie de Bourbon, mȧ'rē' ȧ'mȧ'lē' dẹh boor'bôn', Queen of France, born near Naples in 1782, was a daughter of Ferdinand I., King of the Two Sicilies. She was married in 1809 to the Duke of Orléans, afterwards King Louis Philippe. After his death she retired to England, where she resided at Claremont, near London. Died in 1866.

Marie Anne Christine Victoire de Bavière mȧ'rē' ȧn krès'tēn' vèk'twȧr' dẹh bȧ've-air', daughter of Ferdinand, Elector of Bavaria, was born at Munich in 1660. In 1680 she was married to Louis, the Dauphin of France, son of Louis XIV. She died in 1690, leaving three sons.

Marie Antoinette Josèphe Jeanne d'Autriche, mȧ'rē' ôN'twȧ'nēt' zho'zȧf' zhȧn dō'trèsh', (commonly called simply Marie Antoinette,) born at Vienna in 1755, was the daughter of Maria Theresa and the emperor Francis I. of Germany. She was married in 1770 to the Dauphin of France, afterwards Louis XVI. High-spirited and energetic, she strove during the revolutionary troubles to inspire the king with her own courage; but her counsels often led him into greater difficulties. It was her misfortune and the misfortune of France that she resisted all those reforms which might have prevented or moderated the violence of the Revolution. Possessing extraordinary personal charms and great vivacity of disposition, the freedom of her manners was often misconstrued by her enemies; but their accusations are generally believed to have been groundless. During the terrible scenes which followed the captivity of the royal family, she displayed the greatest firmness and dignity, showing on all occasions more concern for her husband and children than for herself. After the fall of the Girondists, Marie Antoinette was condemned to death by the Jacobins, and executed in October, 1793. (See LOUIS XVI.)

Marie de Médicis, mȧ're' dẹh mȧ'de'sèss', or Maria de' Medici, mȧ-ree'ȧ dȧ mēd'e-chee, the daughter of Francis, Grand Duke of Tuscany, and the archduchess Joan of Austria, was born at Florence in 1573. She was married in 1600 to Henry IV. of France. She had moderate abilities, but exorbitant ambition; and her obstinacy and violent temper were the source of constant dissension between her and her husband. On the death of Henry she became regent, for which office she proved herself utterly incompetent. Having given offence to her subjects by her partiality for unworthy favourites, she was deposed and imprisoned, but, effecting her escape, again took part in the government. She introduced Richelieu into the administration, who soon possessed himself of the highest power, and induced her son, Louis XIII., to imprison her (1630) at Compiègne. After a second escape, she died at Cologne in 1642.

Having early manifested a love for the arts, she studied sculpture and design under Ary Scheffer. Among her works the statue of Joan of Arc is the most generally admired. She was married in 1837 to Duke Alexander of Würtemberg. Died in 1839.

Marie Thérèse. See MARIA THERESA.

Mariette, mȧ're'ēt', (AUGUSTE ÉDOUARD,) a celebrated French archæologist, born at Boulogne in 1821. Having acquired a knowledge of Egyptian hieroglyphics he was charged in 1850 with a scientific mission to Egypt, where he discovered the site of the city of Memphis and disinterred the temple of Serapis and a necropolis of vast extent. In this were found the granite sarcophagi of the bulls of Apis, hewn out of a single stone, fifteen feet long, nine in width, and the same in height. He also removed the sand from the colossal Sphinx, which was cut entire from a rock. He published "The Serapeum at Memphis," illustrated, (1857–66,) "Researches in Egypt, Nubia, and the Soudan," (1867,) "The Egyptian Papyruses in the Museum at Boulac," (2 vols., 1871–73,) "Deir-el-Bahari: Topographical, Historical, and Ethnographical Documents gleaned in that Temple," (1877.) He died January 19, 1881.

Mariette, (PIERRE JEAN,) a French painter, born in Paris in 1694, was one of the most distinguished amateurs of his time, and became director of the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. He was a member of the Academy of Painting in Paris, and of the Academy of Design at Florence. He published, among other works, a "Treatise on the Engraved Gems of the Royal Cabinet." Died in 1774.

Marignolli, de, dȧ mȧ-rēn-yôl'lee, (GIOVANNI,) known also as John of Florence, a Franciscan monk of Italy, born about 1288. In 1338 he was one of four clerics sent from Avignon by Pope Benedict XII. to the Khan of Cathay, (China.) In 1342 they arrived at Pekin, in 1348 went to Malabar, in India, and in 1353 Marignolli was again at the papal court. He was afterwards made Bishop of Bisignano, and thereafter was a chaplain to the emperor Charles IV., who caused him to write "Monumenta Historica Bohemiæ," in which he curiously interpolated stories of his adventures in the East. The passages of this description were put together and translated by H. Yule, (1866.)

Marigny, de, dẹh mȧ′rèn′ye′, (Abel François Poisson—pwȧ′sȯN′,) Marquis, a French architect, born in Paris in 1727, was a brother of Madame de Pompadour, through whose influence he was appointed in 1751 director-general of the royal buildings. Died in 1781.

Marigny, de, (Enguerrand,) a French statesman, filled several high offices under Philippe le Bel, and attained the rank of prime minister. Soon after the accession of Louis X., he was condemned to death on the false accusations of his enemies, and executed about 1315.

Marigny, de, (François Augier,) a French Orientalist and historian, born about 1690. He produced a "History of the Twelfth Century," (5 vols., 1750,) and a "History of the Arabs under the Government of the Caliphs," (4 vols., 1750.) Died in Paris in 1762.

Marigny, de, (Gaspard Augustin René Bernard,) a French officer, born at Luçon in 1754, was one of the royalist chiefs in the Vendean war. He was condemned to death by his own party for alleged neglect of duty, and executed in 1794.

Marigny, de, (Jacques Carpentier,) a French priest, noted for his wit, born near Nevers. He wrote several poems, and Letters, (1678.) Died in 1670.

Marillac, de, dẹh mȧ′re′yȧk′, (Charles,) an able French negotiator, born in Auvergne about 1510. He was chosen Archbishop of Vienne, and conducted successfully some important negotiations in Germany and Rome. He was at the head of a small number of French bishops known by their tendency to a philosophic spirit. Died in 1560.

Marillac, de, (Louis,) a nephew of the preceding, was born in Auvergne in 1572. He served with distinction in the armies of Henry IV., and was made a marshal of France in 1629. Being afterwards suspected of conspiring against Cardinal Richelieu, he was executed, on a charge of peculation, in 1632.

See "Procès du Maréchal de Marillac," etc., 1633; Richelieu, "Journal."

Marillac, de, (Michel,) a French statesman, brother of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1563. He was appointed by Cardinal Richelieu keeper of the seals, (1626.) Having subsequently incurred the enmity of the cardinal, he was imprisoned at Châteaudun in 1630, where he died in 1632.

Marin. See Marinus of Tyre.

Marin, mȧ′rȧN′, a French mechanician, and a native of Lisieux, invented the air-gun, which he exhibited in the presence of Henry of Navarre.

Marin, (François Louis Claude,) a French littérateur, born in Provence in 1721. Among his principal works is a "History of Saladin, Sultan of Egypt," etc. Died in 1809.

Marin, (Michel Ange,) a French ecclesiastic and devotional writer, born at Marseilles in 1697. He published "Lives of the Hermits of the East," (3 vols. 4to, 1761,) and numerous other works. Died in 1767.

Marina, mȧ-ree′nȧ, Malinche, mȧ-lèn′chȧ, written also Malintzin, the daughter of a Mexican chief, born about 1505, was sold as a slave, and subsequently fell into the hands of Cortez, whom she accompanied in all his expeditions. She possessed rare beauty and talents, and, from her knowledge of the Spanish as well as Mexican languages, was of great service as an interpreter. After the death of Cortez, she was married to Don Juan de Xamarillo, a Spanish officer. Marina has been celebrated by the Spanish poet Moratin in his "Noves de Cortés."

See Bernal Diaz, "Historia de la Conquista del Mexico;" Prescott, "History of the Conquest of Mexico," book ii.

Mario, mȧ′re-ō, (Giuseppe,) Marchese di Candia, an Italian operatic singer, born at Cagliari, Sardinia, in 1810, of a noble but impoverished family. In 1830 he accepted a commission in the Sardinian army, but tendered his resignation in 1836, and, when it was not accepted, he escaped to Paris. His exquisite tenor voice gained him a great reputation in amateur circles, and he was reluctantly induced to accept the munificent offers of the director of the Paris Opera. Under the assumed name of Mario, he made his first public appearance December 1, 1838, in the rôle of "Robert le Diable." His success was immediate. In 1839, while still attached to the Paris Opera, he sang for a brief period in London, and was greeted with favour. In 1840 he passed over to the Italian Opera, and for several years he sang each season in both Paris and London. In 1849 he went to Saint Petersburg. In 1854–55 he accompanied Grisi on a tour through the United States. He had been living with Grisi for some years, and on the dissolution of her first marriage was legally united to her. On June 18, 1871, he took his farewell of the operatic stage at Covent Garden, London. In 1872 he again visited the United States on a concert tour. Died at Rome, December 11, 1883.

Mariti, mȧ-ree'tee, (GIOVANNI,) an Italian traveller and writer, born at Florence in 1736, visited the isle of Cyprus, Syria, and Palestine, and published in 1769 an account of his journey, which was translated into French, German, and Swedish. Died in 1806.

Maritz, mȧ'rits or mȧ'rĕts', (JEAN,) a Swiss mechanician, born at Berne in 1711, invented a machine for boring and turning cannon. For this service he was ennobled by the French government. Died in 1790.

Mariuccia. See MAROZIA.

Mā'rĭ-us, (CAIUS,) a Roman general, distinguished for his splendid talents, indomitable energy, and unprincipled ambition, was born near Arpinum (now Arpino) in 157 B.C. His parents were poor and plebeian. He served under Scipio Africanus at the siege of Numantia, and was chosen tribune of the people in 119. He obtained the prætorship in 115, though strongly opposed by the patrician party, and about the same time married Julia, an aunt of Julius Cæsar. Having accompanied Metellus as legate and second in command into Africa, (109 B.C.,) he won such popularity by his skill and bravery that he was elected consul for 107 B.C. and intrusted with the command of the Jugurthine war. He defeated Jugurtha, who was made prisoner in 106. In 104 B.C. Marius was again chosen consul, as being the only one capable of defending the state from the threatened invasion of the Teutones and Cimbri. He defeated the barbarians at Aix, (Aquæ Sextiæ,) in Gaul, in 102 B.C. Having been elected consul the next year, for the fifth time, Marius, in conjunction with Catulus, gained a signal and overwhelming victory over the Cimbri in the plain of Vercellæ, (Vercelli.) By the aid of the tribune Saturninus, Marius became consul for 100 B.C., in spite of the determined hostility of the patricians. During this consulate an agrarian law was passed, and Metellus Numidicus was exiled for refusing to conform to it. On the expiration of his term of office, Marius went to Asia, under the pretext of sacrificing to Cybele, but really in order to excite Mithridates to a war with Rome, that he might again distinguish himself in his congenial element. In 90 B.C. both Marius and Sulla entered the service of the consuls Octavius and Cinna in the Marsian or Social war; but, jealous of the reputation of his rival, the former soon resigned. Sulla, having become consul in 88 B.C., obtained the command in the Mithridatic war, upon which Marius, assisted by his friends, caused a law to be passed transferring it to him. He was soon driven from the city by Sulla and his adherents, and forced to take refuge in Africa. When Sextilius, Governor of Libya, sent him orders to leave the country, on pain of being treated as an enemy, Marius replied to the messenger, "Go tell him that you have seen the exile Marius sitting on the ruins of Carthage." The next year, while Sulla was absent in Greece, Marius, joined by the consul Cinna, entered Rome and ordered a general massacre of the opposite party. Among the patricians who perished was M. Antonius, the orator so highly praised by Cicero. Marius and Cinna became consuls, (86 B.C.,) but the former was attacked by a fever, of which he died the same year.

Marius, (CAIUS,) nephew and adopted son of the preceding, took refuge, after the proscription of his uncle, with Hiempsal, King of Numidia. He was made consul in 82 B.C., and signalized himself by many acts of injustice and cruelty. Having been defeated by Sulla, he caused himself to be killed by one of his officers.

Marius, (MARCUS AURELIUS,) one of the Thirty Tyrants of Gaul, was, on the death of Victorinus the Younger, chosen emperor by the army. He was assassinated about 268 A.D., after a reign of a few months.

Marivaux, de, dẹh mȧ're'vō', (PIERRE CARLET DE CHAMBLAIN,) a French novelist and dramatic writer born in Paris in 1688. His principal works are his romances entitled "Marianne" and "Le Paysan parvenu," which enjoyed great popularity at the time, and were among the first novels which delineated real life and manners. He also wrote a number of comedies. The affected style and false sentiment of these productions have given rise to the term marivaudage. "Never," says La Harpe, "did any one turn common thoughts in so many ways, each more affected than the last;" and Voltaire, admitting that Marivaux knew "the paths to the heart," maintains that "he was ignorant of the high-road." He was elected to the French Academy in 1743, having Voltaire for a competitor. Died in 1763.

Mark, [Gr. Μάρκος; Lat. MAR'CUS; It. MAR'CO; Fr. MARC, märk,] SAINT, THE EVANGELIST. He was a companion of Saint Peter in his travels, (see I. Peter v. 13,) and is supposed to have planted the Church at Alexandria. The early Christian writers believed that he was the interpreter of Saint Peter, and that he wrote his Gospel in Greek, under the direction and with the approbation of that apostle. Saint Augustine thought it was an abridgment of the Gospel of Matthew. According to tradition, he suffered martyrdom in Egypt in 68 A.D. By many critics he is identified with John surnamed Mark, who was a companion of Paul and Barnabas in their mission to the Gentiles about 45 A.D., (Acts xii. 12, 25, xiii. 13, xv. 37,) and who was in Rome with Paul in 63 A.D.

Mark'ham, (CLEMENT ROBERTS,) an English geographer and author, born at Stillingfleet, Yorkshire, July 20, 1830. He was a naval officer from 1844 to 1851, entered the civil service in 1855, and afterwards was employed in the India Office. He visited the Arctic regions in 1850–51, travelled extensively in Peru, (1852,) and introduced successfully the culture of cinchona-trees into India, (1860–61,) carrying the plants from South America. He was attached to the British army in Abyssinia, 1867–68. He has written several works relating to South America and India, besides works of travel, etc., and a "Quichua Grammar and Dictionary," (1863,) "Life of Lord Fairfax," (1870,) "Memoir of the Countess of Chinchon," (1875,) "Peruvian Bark," (1880,) etc.

Markham, mark'ăm, (GERVASE,) an English soldier and miscellaneous writer, born in Nottinghamshire about 1570, served in the royalist army in the civil war. He was the author of a tragedy entitled "Herod and Antipater," "The Poem of Poems, or Sion's Muse," etc., and other works. Died about 1655.

Mark'land, (JEREMIAH,) an eminent English scholar and critic, born in Lancashire in 1693. He published editions of the "Sylvæ" of Statius (1728) and the "Supplices" of Euripides, which are esteemed masterpieces of acute criticism. He also assisted Dr. Taylor in preparing his editions of Demosthenes and Lysias, and published "Remarks on the Epistles of Cicero to Brutus," etc., in which he attempts to prove them spurious. Died in 1776.

Markof, mar'kof, Markov, or Markow, (ARCADI IVANOVITCH,) COUNT, a Russian diplomatist. On the accession of Alexander I. he was appointed minister-plenipotentiary to France, (1800.)

Marlborough, măl'bŭr-ŭh, (popularly called in French MALBROUK, măl'brook'; Sp. MAMBRU, mâm-broo',) DUKE OF, originally John Churchill, an English general, whose military genius and triumphs have been equalled by those of few men of modern times, was born at Ashe, in Devonshire, June 24, 1650. He was the son of Sir Winston Churchill and of Elizabeth Drake. His education was rather defective. He received from nature an eminently handsome person, a bland temper, and all the qualities essential to a successful general and courtier. In 1672, with the rank of captain, he served in the army which fought in alliance with France against the Dutch. His bravery in this and the ensuing campaigns attracted the favourable notice of Turenne and Louis XIV. At the peace of 1678 he returned to England, and married Sarah Jennings, whose talents and imperious temper enabled her to exert an important influence over his political conduct.

He was the favourite attendant and confidential agent of the Duke of York before his accession as James II., in 1685; and soon after that event he was raised to the peerage, as Baron Churchill of Sandridge. Having contributed to the defeat of Monmouth at Sedgemoor, he was made a major-general. His wife was the favourite of the king's daughter, Princess Anne, over whom she had a complete ascendency. In the combinations and intrigues which preceded the revolution of 1688, Lord Churchill acted with deep duplicity. After secretly committing himself to the cause of William of Orange, he professed his devotion to James in November, 1688, and, a few days later, deserted to the stronger party. He was created Earl of Marlborough on the accession of William III., (1689,) and made a lord of the bedchamber.

He commanded the English forces employed against the French in the Low Countries in 1689, and led a successful expedition against Cork and Kinsale in September, 1690. While he was thus trusted by William and hated as an arch-traitor by the Jacobites, he opened a treasonable correspondence with the dethroned king, who was at Saint Germain's. According to Macaulay, he undertook to corrupt the army, with which his brilliant successes and winning manners rendered him a favourite in spite of his sordid avarice. The country being apprised of this plot, he was deprived of his offices in January, 1692, and committed to the Tower a few months later. Though he was quickly admitted to bail, he passed the next four years in disgrace. About the end of 1696 he was restored to his military rank and command, and admitted to the privy council. (Respecting Macaulay's charges against Marlborough, see J. Paget's "New Examen," 1861, and the "Quarterly Review" for April, 1868.)

In 1701, William took Marlborough to Holland, gave him command of his army, and invested him with ample powers to negotiate with the allies in relation to the impending war of the Spanish succession. He displayed here the sagacity and address of a consummate diplomatist. The accession of Queen Anne, in March, 1702, opened to him a brilliant career of glory abroad and power at home. He became commander-in-chief of the allied army, and at the end of the campaign in Flanders, December, 1702, was created Duke of Marlborough. About this time he and Prince Eugene began to act in concert, and formed a cordial friendship, which greatly promoted the success of the allies. Among their most celebrated achievements was the decisive victory at Blenheim over the French marshal Tallard, August 13, 1704. Marlborough gained a great victory at Ramillies in 1706, and shared with Eugene the triumph at Oudenarde in 1708. The allies also claimed the victory over Marshal Villars at Malplaquet, (1709,) although their loss amounted, it is said, to 25,000 men.

During these foreign transactions, Godolphin, the duke's personal and political friend, had been the head of the English Tory ministry. The Tories, who had the warm sympathy of the queen, wished to discontinue the war, and fomented intrigues against Marlborough. His duchess, a zealous Whig, with much importunity prevailed on him to coalesce with the Whigs, who insisted on prolonging the war. The fondness of the queen for the Duchess of Marlborough was at length turned into violent aversion. The Tories obtained a complete ascendency in 1710, and Marlborough was dismissed with disgrace from all his employments at the end of 1711. On the accession of George I. (1714) he was restored to favour, and again became captain-general and master of the ordnance. He died in 1722, leaving his titles and estate to the male heirs of his daughter, who was married to Charles Spencer, Earl of Sunderland. (See SPENCER.)

Marlborough, (SARAH JENNINGS,) DUCHESS OF, the wife of the preceding, born in 1660, was celebrated for her beauty, ambition, and political influence. She was brought up from childhood with the princess Anne, who regarded her with romantic fondness, combined with the deference which the weak feel for superior minds. Impatient of the restraints of etiquette, Anne, in conversation and correspondence with her favourite, assumed the name of Mrs. Morley, and addressed her friend as Mrs. Freeman. In 1678 Miss Jennings was married to Colonel Churchill, in whom she found an uxorious husband. "History," says Macaulay, "exhibits to us few spectacles more remarkable than that of a great and wise man who could carry into effect vast and profound schemes of policy only by inducing one foolish woman, who was often unmanageable, to manage another woman who was more foolish still. . . . To the last hour of her husband's life, she enjoyed the pleasure and distinction of being the one human being who was able to mislead that far-sighted and sure-footed judgment, who was fervently loved by that cold heart and servilely feared by that intrepid spirit." Having been supplanted in the royal favour by Mrs. Masham, she was dismissed from court in 1710, and became an inveterate misanthrope. Died in 1744.

Marliani, mar-le-ä'nee, (BARTOLOMMEO,) an Italian antiquary, born at Milan. He wrote "Topography of Rome," ("Urbis Romæ Topographia,") and other works. Died about 1560.

Marlorat, mär'lo'rä', (AUGUSTIN,) a French Protestant theologian, born at Bar-le-Duc in 1506. He became minister of the Reformed Church at Rouen in 1560, and acquired a great influence by his talents. He wrote commentaries on Scripture, and other works. He was put to death at Rouen in 1563.

See HAAG, "La France protestante."

Marlowe, mar'lo, (CHRISTOPHER,) an English dramatist, born at Canterbury in 1564. He studied at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he took his degree in 1587. He afterwards devoted himself to dramatic writing, and, according to some authorities, became an actor. He was addicted to low vices, and was killed in a quarrel with a footman in 1593. The principal dramas known to be his are "The Jew of Malta," "Edward the Second," and "The Tragical History, etc. of Dr. Faustus:" the last-named was the original of Goethe's celebrated "Faust." Marlowe is characterized by the French critic Villemain as a genius, whose rude dramas, disorderly as his life, contain splendid beauties and a gloomy audacity, the influence of which has not been lost upon Shakspeare. His "Faust" is less elegant and less ironical than that of Goethe, but every thing that the pathos of such a subject can effect—the fever of doubt in a superstitious imagination, the boldness of impiety in a despairing heart—stamps this work with the impress of extraordinary power. His "Edward II." was greatly admired by Charles Lamb, who says that one of its scenes moves pity and terror beyond any scene, ancient or modern.

Marmont, de, dẽh mär'môn', (AUGUSTE FRÉDÉRIC LOUIS VIESSE,) Duke of Ragusa, a celebrated French marshal, born at Châtillon-sur-Seine in 1774, received his military education at the artillery school of Châlons. He accompanied Bonaparte as aide-de-camp in the Italian campaign of 1794, and, as general of brigade, took part in the invasion of Egypt in 1798. He fought with distinguished bravery at the battle of Marengo, (1800,) obtained command of a division, and was appointed inspector-general of artillery about 1802. Having assisted at the capture of Ulm, in 1805, Marmont became in 1806 general-in-chief of the army in Dalmatia, and gained a signal victory over a superior force of Russians and Montenegrins at Castelnuovo. In 1807 he carried out a system of public works, the most important of which was a line of road-way two hundred and ten miles in length; and for this service he was created Duke of Ragusa. Soon after the battle of Wagram (1809) he was made a marshal of France, and appointed Governor-General of the Illyrian provinces. As commander of the second corps, in 1813 he took part in the battles of Bautzen, Dresden, and Leipsic, and closed the campaign of 1814 by his engagement near Paris with the allied army of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, (March 30.) Though contending against a greatly superior force, Marmont and Mortier refused to capitulate until authorized to do so by Joseph Bonaparte. In April, 1814, Marshal Marmont, after stipulating with Prince Schwarzenberg for the withdrawal of the French troops into Normandy, entered the service of the allies. He subsequently filled several high offices under the Bourbons. Being called upon to suppress the revolt of July, 1830, he brought great opprobrium upon himself by his failure in this difficult task; his name was struck off the army list, and he was exiled. He died at Venice in 1852, leaving "Mémoires du Duc de Raguse," (8 vols., 1856.)

Marmontel, mär'môn'tĕl', (JEAN FRANÇOIS,) a celebrated French critic and miscellaneous writer, born in Limousin in 1723. His family was poor, and he was educated in the Jesuits' College at Mauriac, but he did not enter their order. At an early age he acquired the friendship and patronage of Voltaire, on whose recommendation he visited Paris in 1746, and published the same year a translation of Pope's "Rape of the Lock." He brought out in 1748 his "Dionysius the Tyrant," ("Denys le Tyran,") which was soon followed by "Aristomène" and "Cléopâtre," three tragedies, which had considerable success at the time. His "Moral Tales" ("Contes moraux," 1761) were received with extraordinary favour, and were translated into the principal languages of Europe, including Danish and Hungarian. They are written with great elegance and animation; though their morality is often questionable. About this time Marmontel was imprisoned for a short time in the Bastille, on a false accusation of having satirized a person of rank. He published in 1763 his "Poétique Française," and in 1767 his political romance of "Bélisaire," which obtained great popularity and has taken its place among the classics of the language. The empress Catherine II. ordered a translation of it into Russian, and versions of it appeared in nearly all the European languages. Some passages in the book, however, which favoured toleration, were denounced by the Sorbonne, and the work was condemned by the Archbishop of Paris, as containing impious and heretical propositions. In the exciting controversy which followed, Voltaire took an active part, and published several witty and caustic pamphlets in defence of his protégé. Marmontel was soon after appointed historiographer of France. Among the most important of his other works we may name "Les Incas," a romance, dedicated to Gustavus III. of Sweden, the comic operas of "Le Huron," "Sylvain," and "Zémire et Azor," and the tragedy of "Les Héraclides," which is highly commended by La

Harpe. His "Eléments de Littérature" (6 vols., 1787) is also ranked among his best productions. In 1783 Marmontel succeeded D'Alembert as perpetual secretary of the French Academy. He lived in retirement in the country during the greater part of the Revolution, and died in 1799, leaving "Mémoires" of his life. He had married about 1778 the niece of Abbé Morellet.

Marmora, della, del'lâ mar'mo-râ, (ALBERTO Ferrero—fêr-râ'ro,) COUNT, a Sardinian general and savant, born in 1789. He entered the French army, and rose to be military commander in the island of Sardinia in 1849. He published "Travels in Sardinia; or, Statistical, Physical, and Political Description of that Island."

Marmora, della, (ALESSANDRO FERRERO,) brother of the preceding, born in 1799, fought in the war for Italian independence in 1848, and became a major-general. He died in the Crimea in 1855.

Marmora, della, (ALFONSO FERRERO,) an Italian general and statesman, brother of the preceding, was born in Turin in 1804. He was appointed minister of war by the King of Sardinia in November, 1849, resigned in February, 1855, and the same year took command of the Sardinian forces in the Crimean war, after which he again served as minister of war. He was president of the Council of Ministers from July, 1859, to July, 1860. In September, 1864, he became minister of foreign affairs and president of the Council of Ministers in the kingdom of Italy. He was succeeded by Ricasoli in June, 1866, took command of the army, and was defeated by the archduke Albert of Austria, at Custozza, in July of the same year. Died at Florence, January 8, 1878.

Marmora, della, (CARLO FERRERO,) MARQUIS, Prince of Masserano, eldest brother of the preceding, was born in 1788. Having been made lieutenant-general and senator of the kingdom of Sardinia, he accompanied Charles Albert as first aide-de-camp in the campaigns of 1848 and 1849. Died in 1854.

Marnix de Saint-Aldegonde, van, vân mâr'neks' deh sân'tâl'deh-gônd', (PHILIPPE,) an eminent Flemish writer and Protestant Reformer, was born at Brussels in 1538. He studied at Geneva, where he acquired the friendship of Calvin and adopted his faith. In 1566 he drew up the celebrated formulary of the Flemish nobles against the Inquisition. As burgomaster of Antwerp, he defended that city in 1584 against Alexander, Duke of Parma; but he was forced to capitulate in 1585. He was the author of a "Picture of the Difference between the Christian Religion and Popery," and "The Romish Bee-Hive." He also translated the Psalms into Dutch verse, and was engaged on a Flemish version of the Scriptures when he died, in 1598. "He was," says Motley, "a man of most rare and versatile genius. Scholar, theologian, diplomatist, swordsman, orator, poet, pamphleteer, he had genius for all things, and was eminent in all."

Marot, mâ'ro', (CLÉMENT,) a French poet, born at Cahors in 1495, was a son of Jean, noticed below. He was patronized at the court of Francis I., and became a page to his sister, Margaret of Valois. He was imprisoned in 1526 on a charge of heresy, and during his confinement composed his "Enfer," ("Hell,") an allegorical satire, and prepared a new edition of the "Roman du Rose." After his release he visited Geneva, where he professed Calvinism; but he was subsequently obliged to leave the place, on account of some misdemeanour, and, having renounced his new faith, accompanied Francis I. in his Italian campaign of 1535. He was the author of numerous lyric poems, epigrams, etc., which were greatly admired for their grace and vivacity; and the style Marotique has been imitated by La Fontaine and other French writers. His version of the Psalms was very popular at the time. Died in 1544.

Marquette, măr'kĕt', (Jacques,) a celebrated French missionary and discoverer, was born in Picardy. He travelled and laboured several years in Canada and other regions. The first Europeans who are certainly known to have discovered and explored the Mississippi River were Father Marquette and M. Joliet, who in 1673 conducted a small exploring party from Quebec. Entering the great river at the mouth of the Wisconsin, they descended in canoes nearly to the mouth of the Arkansas, or to latitude 34°, which they reached in July, 1673. They were deterred from pursuing the voyage by reports that the river below was infested by armed savages, and they returned in canoes to the mouth of the Illinois, which they ascended. Marquette wrote a narrative of this expedition, which was published in Paris in 1681. "He writes," says Professor Sparks, "as a scholar and as a man of careful observation and practical sense. In every point of view, this tract is one of the most interesting among those that illustrate the early history of America." Having resumed his missionary labours among the Miamis on Lake Michigan, he died there in 1675.

Mar'ry-at, (Frederick,) a popular English novelist and naval officer, born in London in 1792. He entered the service as midshipman under Lord Cochrane in 1806, and distinguished himself during the three following years in numerous engagements in the Mediterranean and off the French coasts. He was made a captain in 1815, and in 1821 commanded the Rosario, which brought to the English government the news of the death of Napoleon. He assisted in the attack on Rangoon in 1823, and in the expedition against the Malays in 1824. He published, besides other novels, "Peter Simple," (1834,) "Jacob Faithful," (1834,) "Japhet in Search of his Father," (1836,) "Mr. Midshipman Easy," (1836,) and "Masterman Ready," (1841.) Among his works is "Valerie," an Autobiography, and a "Diary in America," (6 vols., 1839.) Died in 1848.

See "Edinburgh Review" for October, 1839.

Mars, [Gr. Ἄρης, (Arēs;) It. Marte, maR'tȧ,] the name of the Roman god of war, was a contraction of Mavors. He was supposed to be a son of Jupiter and Juno, and was identified with the Ares of Greek mythology. According to Ovid, he was a son of Juno, but had no father. He was worshipped with extraordinary honours by the Romans, of whom he was one of the tutelary deities. Homer and other poets relate that Mars fought for the Trojans at the siege of Troy and was wounded by Diomede. He was called Gradivus, Quirinus, Mavors, Salisubulus, Mamers, Enyalus, and Camulus. The amours of Mars and Venus are very celebrated. He was said to be the father of Romulus, Remus, Cupid, Harmonia, and Meleager. Ares was one of the twelve great Olympian gods of the Greeks, and was especially worshipped in Thrace. According to tradition, he fled to Egypt during the contest between Typhon and the gods, and changed himself into a fish. Having killed a son of Neptune, he was prosecuted before the Areopagus (Mars Hill) at Athens, and was acquitted. Mars was believed to love war for its own sake, and to delight in carnage. He is usually represented as a grim soldier in full armour,—sometimes as driving furiously in a war-chariot.

Mars, marz or mȧrs, (ANNE FRANÇOISE HIPPOLYTE Boutet Monvel—boo'tā' mòn'vĕl',) MADEMOISELLE, a celebrated French actress, born in Paris in 1779. She was the daughter of Monvel, a popular actor at the Théâtre Français, and an actress named Mars, and was early trained for the stage. She excelled in genteel comedy, in which she was considered unrivalled among the actors of her time. She retired from the stage in 1841. Died in 1847.

Marsand, mar-sȧnd', (ANTONIO,) an Italian littérateur, born at Venice in 1765. He published an excellent edition of Petrarch's poems, with a memoir, and several original works on various subjects. Died in 1842.

Marschall von Bieberstein, mar'shȧl fon bee'bĕr-stīn', (FRIEDRICH,) FREIHERR, a German botanist, born in 1766, removed to Russia, where he became a councillor of state. He published "Flora Taurico-Caucasica," (1808–19.) Died in 1826.

Marschner, marsh'nĕr, (HEINRICH,) a German composer and musician, born at Zittau in 1795, was appointed chapel-master at Hanover. Among his most popular works are the operas of "The Vampyre," "The Templar and the Jewess," and "Hans Heiling." Died in 1861.

See FÉTIS, "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens."

Mars'dĕn, (WILLIAM,) an eminent Orientalist, of English extraction, born at Dublin in 1754. Having entered the service of the East India Company, he sailed in 1771 to Bencoolen, Sumatra, where he was appointed principal secretary to the government and devoted himself to the study of the Malay language. He returned in 1779 to England, and was soon after elected a Fellow of the Royal Society. He published in 1782 his "History of Sumatra," which was very favourably received and was translated into French and German. He was subsequently appointed chief secretary to the board of admiralty, with the war salary of £4000 per annum. Having resigned this post in 1807, he brought out in 1812 his "Grammar" and "Dictionary" of the Malay language, which are esteemed standard works. He also made an excellent translation of the "Travels of Marco Polo," with a commentary, and wrote a description of Eastern coins, entitled "Numismata Orientalia Illustrata," (1823.) He gave up his pension to the government in 1831, and soon after presented his valuable collection of coins and medals to the British Museum, and his library to King's College. Died in 1836.

Marsh, (ANNA CALDWELL,) MRS., an English authoress, born in Staffordshire about 1798. Among her most popular works are "Tales of the Woods and Fields," (1836,) "Ravenscliffe," "Mount Sorel," (1843,) and "Emilia Wyndham," (1846.) Died October 5, 1874.

Marsh, (DEXTER,) an American geologist, born in 1806, made a large and choice collection of specimens of fossil footprints, obtained chiefly in the Connecticut valley. Died in 1853.

Marsh, (GEORGE PERKINS,) LL.D., an American philologist, born at Woodstock, Vermont, March 15, 1801. He was appointed minister to Turkey in 1849, in 1852 was sent on an embassy to Greece, and in 1861 was appointed minister to Italy. His chief published works are a "Compendious Grammar of the Old Northern or Icelandic Language, compiled and translated from the Grammar of Rask," (1838,) "Lectures on the English Language," (1861,) "The Origin and History of the English Language," (1862,) "Man and Nature," (1864,) enlarged and re-written, and issued in 1874 under the title of "The Earth as Modified by Human Action." He died July 24, 1882. His wife, Caroline C. Marsh, has published a number of poems and made translations from the German.

Marsh, (HERBERT,) a learned English theologian, born in London in 1757. He became professor of divinity at Cambridge in 1807, and rose to be Bishop of Peterborough in 1819. He published several religious and controversial treatises, and translated Michaelis's "Introduction to the New Testament" into English. Died in 1839.

Marsh, (JAMES,) an English chemist, born in 1789, was the inventor of an apparatus, called by his name, which detects the presence of arsenic in liquids, however minute the quantity. Its utility and certainty were verified by Orfila and other toxicologists. Died in 1846.

Marsh, (JAMES,) D.D., a distinguished American scholar and divine, born at Hartford, Vermont, in 1794. He was appointed professor of classics at Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia, and in 1826 president of the University of Vermont. He translated from the German Herder's "Spirit of Hebrew Poetry," and contributed religious and philosophical essays to the "Christian Spectator" and other journals. Died at Colchester, Vermont, July 3, 1842.

Marsh, (NARCISSUS,) a learned prelate, born in Wiltshire in 1638, became successively Archbishop of Dublin and of Armagh. He wrote an "Essay on an Introduction to the Theory of Sounds," which was inserted in the "Philosophical Transactions" of the Royal Society. Died in 1713.

Marsh, (OTHNIEL CHARLES,) an eminent American palæontologist, born at Lockport, New York, October 29, 1831. He graduated at Yale in 1860, studied (1862–65) at Berlin, Breslau, and Heidelberg, and in 1866 was appointed professor of palæontology in Yale College. Professor March is distinguished for the astonishing number and great importance of his discoveries of new species of extinct vertebrate animals, very largely from the Rocky Mountain region. He is author of some one hundred and fifty valuable scientific papers, and of "Odontornithes," (4to, 1880.)

Mar'shall, (CHARLES KIMBALL,) an American Methodist divine, born at Durham, Maine, in 1812, became pastor of a church at Natchez, Mississippi.

Mar'shall, (EMMA, née Martin,) an English novelist, born near Cromer about 1832. Of her very numerous tales, "Mrs. Mainwaring's Journal" (1874) and "Life's Aftermath" (1876) are among the best-known.

Marshall, (HUMPHREY,) an American soldier and lawyer, born in Frankfort, Kentucky, January 13, 1812. He graduated at West Point in 1832, but left the army in 1833, and became a prominent lawyer and politician, being twice sent to Congress. He was a colonel of volunteer cavalry in the Mexican war, and a major-general in the Confederate service, 1861–65. Died at Louisville, March 28, 1872. He was a grandson of Humphry Marshall, noticed below.

Marshall, (HUMPHRY,) an American botanist, was a resident of Pennsylvania. He published in 1785 his "Arbustum Americanum," or catalogue of the trees and shrubs of America, which was translated into French. He was born in 1722, and died in 1801.

See W. DARLINGTON, "Memorials of John Bartram and H. Marshall," 1849.

Marshall, (JOHN,) an eminent American jurist and statesman, born at Germantown, Fauquier county, Virginia, on the 24th of September, 1755. He was the eldest son of Colonel Thomas Marshall and Mary Keith, who had fifteen children. He never attended a college, but he was well educated under the care of his father. He enlisted in the army in 1776, became a captain in May, 1777, and served at the battles of Brandywine, September, 1777, Germantown, and Monmouth, June, 1778. Having resigned his commission in 1781, he began to practise law, and was chosen a member of the House of Delegates in 1782. In 1783 he married Mary Willis Ambler, of York, Virginia, and became a resident of Richmond. As a member of the Convention of Virginia, in 1788, he advocated the adoption of the Federal Constitution by several powerful speeches. He contributed more to the adoption of this Constitution by Virginia than any man except James Madison. He became identified with the Federal party, and cordially supported the administration of Washington. His reputation was widely extended by a speech in the Assembly of Virginia in favour of the treaty negotiated by John Jay with Great Britain in 1794. In 1797 he was associated with General Pinckney and Mr. Gerry in a special mission to the French Directory. His inclination or interest induced him to decline several high offices, but, at the special request of General Washington, he became a candidate for Congress, and was elected, in 1799. He made a great speech in Congress, defending President Adams for his surrender of Thomas Nash, alias Robbins, who was claimed by the British government as a fugitive from justice. This speech settled forever the question whether such cases should be decided by the executive or the judiciary. "That argument," says R. W. Griswold, "deserves to be ranked among the most dignified displays of human intellect." He was appointed secretary of state by President Adams in May, 1800, and displayed great diplomatic ability in his correspondence with Rufus King, minister to England. On the 31st of January, 1801, he was appointed chief justice of the supreme court of the United States. He performed the functions of this high office for thirty-four years, and rendered important services by the just and liberal principles according to which he construed the Constitution. His profound learning and wisdom, his moral courage, and his high-toned virtue secured for him universal respect and confidence. His services as an expounder of constitutional law are commended by Judge Story in the following terms: "If all others of the chief justice's judicial arguments had perished, his luminous judgments on these occasions would have given an enviable immortality to his name." In 1804 he published a "Life of George Washington," (5 vols.,) which is highly esteemed. Judge Marshall was distinguished for his benevolence, modesty, urbanity, and simplicity. He was a devout believer in Christianity, and was happy in his domestic relations. He died in Philadelphia (whither he had gone for medical advice) in July, 1835. "To one who cannot follow his great judgments," says R. W. Griswold, "in which at the same time the depths of legal wisdom are disclosed and the limits of human reason measured, the language of just eulogy must wear an appearance of extravagance. In his own profession he stands for the reverence of the wise rather than for the enthusiasm of the many."

Mar'shall or Mareschal, (THOMAS,) an English scholar, born in Leicestershire about 1621. He became successively rector of Lincoln College, Oxford, chaplain-in-ordinary to the king, and Dean of Gloucester, (1681.) He was distinguished for his knowledge of the Oriental tongues and of the Anglo-Saxon, and published "Observations on Two Ancient Versions of the Gospels,—the Gothic and the Anglo-Saxon," (in Latin, 1665,) also a "Life of Archbishop Usher." Died in 1685.

See WOOD, "Athenæ Oxonienses."

Marshall, (THOMAS FRANCIS,) an American lawyer, a nephew of Chief-Justice John Marshall. He was born at Frankfort, Kentucky, June 7, 1801, and became a highly successful lawyer of Louisville. He was also a judge and a member of Congress. As a political orator and wit he had great fame. Died at Versailles, Kentucky, September 22, 1864.

Marshall, (THOMAS WILLIAM M.,) an English theological writer, born in 1815. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and took orders in the Anglican Church. In 1845 he became a Roman Catholic, and in his "Comedy of Convocation" and "My Clerical Friends and their Relations to Modern Thought" (1873) he showed himself a vigorous satirist of his former religious associates. Among his other works are "Christian Missions, their Agents, their Methods, and their Results," (1862,) "Catholic Missions in Southern India," (1865,) and "Protestant Journalism," (1874.) Died at Surbiton, Surrey, December 14, 1877.

Marshall, (WILLIAM CALDER,) a Scottish sculptor, born in Edinburgh in 1813, was a pupil of Chantrey. He visited Rome about 1836, and settled in London in 1839. Among his chief works are "Sabrina," "Una and the Lion," the "Dancing-Girl Reposing," (1846,) which gained a prize of five hundred pounds, and a statue of Sir Robert Peel.

Marshall, (WILLIAM HUMPHREY,) an English botanist and agricultural writer, born in 1745. He published a number of works which contributed greatly to the improvement of agriculture in England. He also wrote "The American Grove; or, Catalogue of the Trees, etc. of the United States." Died in 1818.

Marsh'am, (Sir JOHN,) an English chronologist, born in London in 1602. He embraced the cause of the royalists in the civil war. He was the author of a work entitled "Chronologicus Canon Ægyptiacus, Ebraicus," etc., (1672,) in which he attempts to reconcile Egyptian chronology with the Hebrew Scriptures, by supposing four collateral dynasties of Egyptian kings reigning at the same time. This theory has been adopted by several eminent scholars. Died in 1685.

See WOOD, "Athenæ Oxonienses;" SHUCKFORD, "Sacred and Profane History."

Marsh'man, (JOSHUA,) an eminent English divine and Orientalist, born in Wiltshire in 1767. Being sent by the Baptist Missionary Society to India in 1799, he became a proficient in the Chinese, Sanscrit, and Bengalee languages. He translated the four Gospels into Chinese, and assisted Dr. Carey in preparing a Sanscrit Grammar and a Bengalee-and-English Dictionary. He also translated the works of Confucius, and wrote a "Defence of the Deity and Atonement of Jesus Christ, in Reply to Rammohun Roy," (1822.) Died in 1837.

See Cox, "History of the Baptist Missionary Society."

Marsigli, mar-sēl'yee, (LUIGI FERDINANDO,) a distinguished Italian naturalist and mathematician, born at Bologna in 1658. He served in the Austrian army against the Turks in 1683 and in several succeeding campaigns, and was made a colonel in 1689. He was one of the founders of the Society of Sciences and Arts at Bologna, (1712,) to which he gave a very valuable scientific collection. He afterwards visited England, where he acquired the friendship of Newton and Halley and was chosen a Fellow of the Royal Society. He was the author of "Physical History of the Sea," (1725,) a description of the shores of the Danube, entitled "Danubius Pannonico-Mysicus," etc., (1726, 7 vols. fol., finely illustrated,) "The Military State of the Ottoman Empire," (1732,) and other works. He had been elected in 1725 a member of the Academy of Sciences, Paris. Died in 1730.

Martial, mar'she-ȧl, [Fr. MARTIAL, mȧR'se'ȧl'; Lat. MARTIA'LIS; It. MARZIALE, mar't-se-ȧ'lȧ,] or, more fully, Mar'cus Vale'rius Martia'lis, a famous Latin epigrammatic poet, born at Bilbilis, in Spain, about 40 A.D., went to Rome at the age of twenty-two, and resided there thirty-five years. The events of his life are very imperfectly known; but it appears that he devoted his attention chiefly to poetry. Some epigrams which he wrote on the occasion of the public spectacles given by Titus about the year 80, procured him the favour of that prince. He was also patronized by Domitian, who made him a tribune and a Roman knight. He was intimate with Juvenal, Quintilian, and Pliny the Younger. About 98 A.D. he returned to his native place, where he died a few years later. Fourteen books of his "Epigrams" are still extant, and are much admired by some eminent critics, such as Scaliger, Lipsius, and Malte-Brun. The latter thinks his writings are among the most interesting monuments of Roman literature, though many of them offend against good taste and pure morality. Probably no poet ever estimated his works more justly than he did in the following line:

("Some are good, some indifferent, and more are bad.")

He studied medicine in his native city, and in 1817 joined the scientific expedition sent by the Austrian and Bavarian governments to Brazil. After his return he published, in 1824, his "Brazilian Travels," a work very attractive in its style, and full of valuable information concerning the natural history of that country. In 1832 he brought out his "Nova Genera et Species Plantarum," (3 vols., with coloured plates,) and in 1845 his superb "Genera et Species Palmarum," being a complete description of the palms, (3 vols., with 219 coloured plates.) Besides the above, we may name the "Flora Brasiliensis," and "The Plants and Animals of Tropical America," (1831.) Von Martius was appointed director of the botanic garden at Munich, and chosen a Fellow of the Royal Society of London, and other institutions of the kind. Died in December, 1868.

Martorelli, mar-to-rel'lee, (GIACOMO,) an Italian antiquary, born at Naples in 1699. He published a treatise "On the Ancient Colonies of Naples," and other works. Died in 1777.

Martos, mar'tos, (IVAN PETROVITCH,) a Russian sculptor, born in Little Russia about 1760. Among his best works are the mausoleum of the emperor Alexander at Taganrog, the colossal group in bronze of the patriots Minin and Pozharsky at Moscow, and the monument of Potemkin at Cherson, also the bas-relief on the monument of the grand duchess Helena Paulovna. Martos was director of the Academy of Fine Arts at Saint Petersburg. Died in 1835.

Mar'tÿ, (MARTIN,) D.D., a bishop, born at Schwyz, Switzerland, January 12, 1834. He was educated at Schwyz, Friburg, and Einsiedeln, became a Benedictine monk in 1855, and a professor in the College of Einsiedeln, removed to Indiana in 1860, and was Abbot of Saint Meinrad, Indiana, 1870–79. In 1880 he was consecrated Bishop of Tiberias and made Vicar-Apostolic of Dakota, where his chief work has been among the Indians. He is author of a "History of the Benedictine Order," in German.

Mar'tÿn, (HENRY,) an able English lawyer and excellent scholar, known as a contributor to the "Spectator." His name appears in No. 555 of the "Spectator" at the head of a list of contributors given by Steele, who says, "He can hardly be mentioned in a list wherein he would not deserve the precedence." He was appointed inspector-general of imports and exports, to reward him for the service he rendered the government by the publication of "The British Merchant, or Commerce Preserved," (about 1713.) Died in 1721.

Martyn, (HENRY,) an eminent English missionary and Orientalist, born at Truro, in Cornwall, in 1781. He studied at Saint John's College, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself by his attainments in the classics, and was chosen a Fellow of the college in 1802. Having become acquainted with the Rev. Charles Simeon about this time, and experienced deep religious convictions, he embarked in 1805 as a missionary for India. He made rapid progress in acquiring the language of the country, and was soon able to translate the New Testament into Hindostanee, and subsequently into Persian. He also made a Persian translation of the Psalms. His health at length gave way under his devoted labours, and he died at Tokat, in Asia Minor, while on his way to England, in 1812.

Martyn, (JOHN,) an English physician and botanist, born in London in 1699. He was elected to the Royal Society in 1727, and in 1733 became professor of botany at Cambridge. His "History of Rare Plants," (in Latin, 1728,) illustrated by Van Hnysum, was the best work of the kind then published, and was translated into German. Martyn also made an excellent translation of Virgil's "Bucolics" and "Georgics," and was a contributor to the "Grub Street Journal." The genus Martynia was named in his honour. Died in 1768.

See GORHAM, "Memoirs of John and Thomas Martyn," 1830. CUVIER, "Histoire des Sciences naturelles."

Martyn, (THOMAS,) son of the preceding, was born at Chelsea in 1735. He succeeded his father as professor of botany at Cambridge in 1761. He wrote several botanical works and miscellaneous treatises. Died in 1825.

Martyn, (WILLIAM,) an English writer, born at Exeter in 1562, was the author of the "History and Lives of the Kings of England from William the Conqueror to the End of the Reign of Henry VIII." Died in 1617.

Ma-rul'lus, (MARCUS,) a Latin satiric poet in the time of Marcus Aurelius. His style is commended by Saint Jerome. There is only a fragment of his works extant.

Marum or Marwm, van, văn mâ'room, (MARTIN,) a Dutch electrician and natural philosopher, born at Delft, March 20, 1750. He was educated at Groningen, and became a physician, and professor of physics at Haarlem. Among his works are "Dissertatio de Motu Fluidorum in Plantis," (1773,) and a noted "Treatise on Electricity," (1776.) Died December 26, 1837.

Mărut [Hindoo pron. mŭr'o͝ot] or Mârut, mâ'ro͝ot, a Sanscrit word, signifying "wind," and applied in the Hindoo mythology to the genii (or gods) presiding over the winds. In the Vedas the Maruts are often addressed as the attendants and allies of Indra, and are called the sons of Prisni, (or Priçni,) or the Earth; they are also called Rudras, or the sons of Rudra, (ro͝od'ra.)

Ma-ru'tha or Maroutha, ma-roo'tha, SAINT, a Syrian prelate, became Bishop of Martyropolis. He was a friend of Saint Chrysostom, and wrote a "History of the Council of Nice," and other works. Died about 420.

Mar'vell, (ANDREW,) an eminent English patriot and satirical writer, born at Kingston-upon-Hull in 1620. Having travelled through France, Spain, Italy, and Holland, where he acquired the languages of those countries, he was, after his return to England, appointed assistant to Milton, then Latin secretary to Cromwell, (1657.) He was first elected to Parliament in 1660, and in this office gave such entire satisfaction to his constituents that he continued to represent them till his death. Marvell's wit and distinguished abilities rendered him formidable to the corrupt administration of Charles II., and attempts were made to win him over by the offer of a large sum of money, which he promptly refused, thus proving his integrity to be equal to his talents. As a writer he is chiefly known by his "Rehearsal Transposed," written in answer to Dr. Parker, afterwards Bishop of Oxford, a fanatical defender of absolute power. Died in 1678.

Marx, marks, (ADOLPH BERNHARD,) a German composer and writer on music, born at Halle in 1799, became professor of music in the University of Berlin in 1830. Among his works are "The Theory of Musical Composition," (1837,) and "General Theory of Music," ("Allgemeine Musiklehre," 1839.) Died at Berlin, May 17, 1866

Marx, (KARL,) a German socialist and agitator, born at Treves in 1818. Educated at Bonn and Berlin, he became an editor at Cologne in 1842, but in 1843 was expelled from Germany. He retired to Paris and engaged in literary work, but in 1846 was sent out of the country. In 1848 he was driven out of Belgium. He, however, was actively engaged in the German revolutionary movements of 1848–49, when he was again banished. From that time he lived mostly in London, where he became one of the leading spirits of the International Association. Among his works are "Misère de la Philosophie," (1847,) "Zur Kritik der politischen Oekonomie," (1859,) "Das Kapital," (1859,) etc. Died March 16, 1883.

Mā'rў, daughter of Henry VII. of England, was born in 1497. She became in 1514 the third wife of Louis XII. of France, who died in the following year. A few months after she was married to Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk. She left one daughter, named Frances, who was the mother of Lady Jane Grey. Died in 1534.

Mary, commonly called BLOODY QUEEN MARY, on account of her cruel persecution of the Protestants, daughter of Henry VIII. by his first wife, Catherine of Aragon, was born at Greenwich in 1516. During her childhood several negotiations were entered into for her marriage, none of which, however, were carried into effect. After the divorce of Catherine, the title of Princess of Wales was transferred from Mary to the Princess Elizabeth. In 1536, on the execution of Queen Anne, Mary was induced to acknowledge Henry's ecclesiastical supremacy and the nullity of his marriage with her mother. Having, by her outward compliance with her father's whims, in some degree gained his favour, the inheritance was secured to her, after her brother Edward and his heirs, in the act of succession of 1544. When Edward succeeded to the throne, Mary resisted all his entreaties, and those of his ministers, to change her religious views, upon which, by the advice of Northumberland, he made over the crown to Lady Jane Grey. (See GREY, Lady JANE.) Mary's first act when established on the throne was to restore to their sees Bonner, Gardiner, and other bishops who had been deposed during the late reign; and shortly afterwards Cranmer and Latimer were committed to the Tower. These measures gave rise to an insurrection of the Protestants, headed by Sir Thomas Wyatt, in 1554, which, being soon quelled, was followed by the execution of Lady Jane Grey, her husband and father, and of Wyatt himself. In July, 1554, Mary was married to the son of Charles V., afterwards Philip II. of Spain. In the November following, Parliament passed acts restoring the authority of the pope and reviving the former statutes against heresy. From this time began a fierce persecution of the Protestants, and it is estimated that two hundred and eighty victims died at the stake between the years 1555 and 1558. Among the most eminent of these martyrs were Bishops Latimer of Worcester and Ridley of London, and Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1557 Mary was induced to assist Philip in his war against France, and the united forces of England and Spain obtained a victory over the French at Saint-Quentin. But the following year Calais was taken by the Duke of Guise. This was a severe blow to Mary, and probably hastened her death, which took place in November, 1558. She was succeeded by her half-sister Elizabeth.

Without defending the cruelties with which Mary's reign has been reproached, the candid historian will find many palliations for her conduct in the spirit of that age, which favoured persecution, in the injustice with which she had been treated by her father, and in the state of her health during that part of her reign when the persecutions were at their height, which made it impossible for her to know the true state of affairs. Froude, who will hardly be suspected of any bias in her favour, says, "To the time of her accession she had lived a blameless and, in many respects, a noble life; and few men or women have lived less capable of doing knowingly a wrong thing." He adds that her trials and disappointments, "it can hardly be doubted, affected her sanity." And he ends with laying the chief blame of the persecutions of her reign first on Gardiner, and secondly, and more especially, on Cardinal Pole.

Mary of Burgundy, [Fr. MARIE DE BOURGOGNE, mȧ'ree' dẹh boor'goñ',] daughter of Charles the Bold and Isabella de Bourbon, was born at Brussels in 1457. On the death of her father, in 1477, she became heiress of Burgundy, and was married the same year to the archduke Maximilian, son of the Emperor of Germany. She died in 1482, in consequence of a fall from her horse. She left two children, Philip, the father of Charles V., and Margaret, Duchess of Savoy.

Mary of Guise, (gweez,) [Fr. MARIE DE GUISE, mȧ'ree' dẹh gü-ēz',] or Mary of Lorraine, [Fr. MARIE DE LORRAINE, mȧ'ree' dẹh lo'rạn',] a daughter of Claude, Duke of Guise, born in 1515, was married in 1534 to Louis d'Orléans, Duke of Longueville, who died the following year. In 1538 she was married to James V. of Scotland, and after his death became, for a short time, regent of the kingdom. She is described by the historian De Thou as naturally inclined to justice and toleration, but she was influenced by the court of France and her brothers, the Duke and Cardinal of Guise. She died in 1560, leaving a daughter Mary, afterwards the celebrated Queen of Scots.

Mary Stu'art, Queen of Scots, born at Linlithgow about the 7th of December, 1542, was the only surviving child of James V. and Mary of Guise, (or Lorraine,) who was a daughter of the French Duke of Guise. James V. died a few days after the birth of Mary, who was crowned in September, 1543, by Cardinal Beatoun. This ambitious and unscrupulous prelate, who was the head of the Roman Catholic party, usurped the office of regent. A treaty having been negotiated for the marriage of Mary with the Dauphin of France, she was sent to France in the summer of 1548 to complete her education. Before the year just mentioned, Scotland had been involved in a war against Henry VIII. of England, who wished to obtain the hand of Mary for his son and thus unite the two countries under one crown.

Educated at the polite and voluptuous court of Paris, Mary excelled in various accomplishments, and at an early age became mistress of the Latin, French, and Italian languages. About the age of fourteen she composed and pronounced before Henry II. a Latin oration, in which she maintained that it is becoming for women to learn literature and liberal arts. Her rare and radiant personal beauty, her intellectual graces, and her fascinating manners rendered her a general favourite and the chief ornament of the French court. "Graceful alike in person and intellect," says Froude, "she possessed that peculiar beauty in which the form is lost in the expression, and which every painter, therefore, has represented differently. Rarely, perhaps, has any woman combined so many noticeable qualities as Mary Stuart: with a feminine insight into men and things and human life, she had cultivated herself to that high perfection in which accomplishments were no longer adventitious ornaments, but were wrought into her organic constitution. . . . She had vigour, energy, tenacity of purpose, with perfect and never-failing self-possession, and, as the one indispensable foundation for the effective use of all other qualities, she had indomitable courage." ("History of England," vol. vii. chap. iv.)

In April, 1558, she was married to the dauphin, who on the death of his father, Henry II., ascended the throne of France, as Francis II., in 1559. On the death of the English queen Mary, Francis and Mary assumed the titles of King and Queen of England, refusing to recognize the right of Elizabeth to the throne. The brilliant prospects of Mary were suddenly clouded by the death of Francis, who died, without issue, in December, 1560. One great obstacle to her prosperity was her zealous attachment to the Roman Catholic religion, which was rejected or abhorred by a majority of her subjects. The Scottish Estates sent Lord James Stuart, Mary's half-brother, to invite her to Scotland and to offer her the free exercise of her religion. Having resolved to return to her native land, she requested permission to pass through England on her way thither; but Elizabeth would not grant this favour to a rival claimant of her crown. Mary was thus reduced to the alternative of a voyage by sea, with the risk of being captured by the English fleet. She embarked in August, 1561, and parted with regret from la belle France, at which, with eyes bathed in tears, she continued to gaze until it was hidden by the darkness. After a passage of four days, she arrived safely at Leith, and chose for her chief advisers Lord James Stuart and William Maitland, of Lethington, both Protestants. She made friends even among the Protestants, but failed to propitiate John Knox, with whom she had an interview. According to Randolph, he made her weep on this occasion.

Soon after her arrival in Scotland, Mary sent Secretary Maitland to London as ambassador. He made overtures of peace and friendship, requiring, however, as an indispensable condition, that Elizabeth and the English Parliament should recognize Mary as her successor in case the former should die without issue. On this condition Mary promised she would not claim the English crown during the life of Elizabeth. "Elizabeth," says Froude, "refused positively to name Mary Stuart her successor, knowing that she would be signing her own death-warrant." These words suggest the probable assassination of Elizabeth by the partisans of her rival. Mary attempted to open the chapel royal for public Catholic service, but the Protestant mob drove away the priest with a broken head, and the queen made concession to the popular will by ordering that the service should be performed privately. In 1562 Mary wrote a letter to Elizabeth, and expressed a great desire to have an interview with her. Several courteously-worded letters were exchanged by them, and their correspondence grew more and more cordial; but a serious difference arose on the choice of a husband for Mary. Elizabeth objected to her proposed marriage with Don Carlos of Spain, and suggested Lord Robert Dudley, her own favourite; but Mary preferred her cousin Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley, (a son of the Earl of Lennox,) whom she married on the 29th of July, 1565. By this act she provoked the violent hostility of the English queen, and estranged from her support her half-brother, James Stuart, Earl of Murray, the ablest Scottish statesman of his time.

"Her gentle administration," says Robertson, "had secured the hearts of her subjects, who were impatient for her marriage and wished the crown to descend in a right line from their ancient monarchs. She herself was the most amiable woman of her age. . . . No event in that age excited stronger political fears and jealousies, none interested more deeply the passions of several princes, than the marriage of the Scottish queen." ("History of Scotland.") Mary made an unwise choice at last; for the character of Darnley was at once weak, capricious, and obstinate. She gave him the title of king, by a stretch of her prerogative which, according to Robertson, was a strong proof of the violence of her love or the weakness of her counsels. Instigated by Queen Elizabeth, the Scottish malcontents, including the Earl of Murray, took arms against Mary in August, 1565; but this revolt was quickly suppressed by the queen, who rode on horseback at the head of her army, and the leaders of the insurgents took refuge in England. Elizabeth disclaimed all responsibility for their conduct, and expressed her abhorrence of their treason.

In 1566 Mary Stuart joined the King of France, the pope, and others, in a Catholic league for the extirpation of heresy, and began to attempt the restoration of popery in Scotland. "To this fatal resolution," says Robertson, "may be imputed all the subsequent calamities of Mary's life." She took into her confidence and favour David Rizzio, (or Ritzio,) an Italian musician, who became her French secretary and inseparable companion, even in the council-room. "He had the control," says Froude, "of all the business of the state." Mary soon repented of her union with the insolent and dissolute Lord Darnley, who treated her with rudeness and neglect and became jealous of Rizzio, whom he resolved to remove by violence. Rizzio was dragged from the queen's presence by the accomplices of Darnley, and killed, in March, 1566. This act was the result of a plot in which the Earl of Morton, Ruthven, Maitland, and other Protestants united for political reasons. Deserted and betrayed by Darnley, they failed to recover power, and fled to England. Although Mary deeply resented the conduct of her husband, she plied him with caresses and gained him over to her interest. About this time a new favourite acquired an ascendant over her heart and began to influence her counsels. This was James Hepburn, Earl of Bothwell, a man of some ability, but unscrupulous and reckless to the last degree. In June, 1566, occurred an event which apparently tended to confirm the power and promote the interest of Queen Mary,—the birth of her son James. In January, 1567, Darnley was attacked with a severe illness at Glasgow, where Mary visited him, and, having employed her artifices to gain his confidence, persuaded him to be removed to the vicinity of Edinburgh. He was lodged in a detached house at Kirk-a-Field, very near the capital. Mary attended her husband assiduously, and slept two nights in the house at Kirk-a-Field, which she left on the 9th of February at 11 P.M. About three hours later the house was blown up by gunpowder, and Darnley was found dead in the garden. Suspicion fell on Bothwell as the chief perpetrator of this crime, and on Mary as an accessary. She outraged public sentiment so far that she not only screened Bothwell from a fair trial, but married him in May, 1567. Robertson and Froude agree in the opinion that Mary was responsible for the death of Darnley.

Impelled by a just and burning indignation, the Scottish lords and people, both Protestant and Catholic, rose in arms against Mary and Bothwell, who, in June, 1567, met them at Carberry Hill with a small army. The troops of the queen, however, refused to fight, and she was compelled to surrender herself to her adversaries, who confined her on a little island in Loch Leven. Queen Elizabeth now interposed in favour of Mary, thinking the treatment she received a dangerous example, and demanded her release,—without effect. The captive queen abdicated in favour of her son, and the Earl of Murray became regent, (July, 1567.) Letters which Mary had written to Bothwell were produced in the Scottish Parliament, by which she was declared to be accessory to the murder of the king. By the aid of George Douglas, a youth of eighteen, she escaped from prison in May, 1568, and was quickly joined by an army of six thousand men, which Regent Murray routed at Langside on the 13th of May. Mary fled to England, and rashly threw herself on the generosity of her rival, who refused to admit her into her presence because she was not yet cleared from the charge of murder. Treated as a prisoner, Mary was confined at Bolton Castle, Coventry, and Fotheringay. She had many adherents in England, who made several attempts against the power and life of Elizabeth. In 1586 she was accused of complicity in Babington's conspiracy, for which she was tried by a commission, and condemned without proof. She was beheaded at Fotheringay Castle on the 8th of February, 1587.

"All contemporary authors," says Robertson, "agree in ascribing to Mary the utmost beauty of countenance and elegance of shape of which the human form is capable. Her hair was black, her eyes were a dark gray, her complexion was exquisitely fine, and her hands and arms remarkably delicate both as to shape and colour. Her stature was of a height that rose to the majestic."

Marzari-Pencati, mard-zâ'ree pĕn-kâ'tee, (Giuseppe,) Count, an Italian mineralogist, born at Vicenza in 1777, discovered in 1810 the mine of fossil coal at Borgo di Valsugna. He invented an instrument for measuring angles, called "Tachigonimetro." Died in 1836.

Mar'zĭ-als, (Theophile,) an English song-writer, born in Brussels, December 21, 1850. His father was a French (Gascon) Protestant pastor, and his mother was English. He was educated in Belgium, Switzerland, and England. In 1870 he obtained employment in the British Museum. He has published "The Gallery of Pigeons, and other Poems," (1873,) and many songs, ballads, rondeaux, etc. He has also composed music for many songs and ballads, and is a successful vocalist.

Masaccio Guidi da San Giovanni, mâ-sât'cho goo-ee'dee dâ sân jo-vân'nee, (Tommaso,) an eminent Italian painter of the Florentine school, born near Florence in 1401, ranks first among the artists of the second or middle age of modern painting. His works were studied by Raphael, Michael Angelo, and Leonardo da Vinci. His figures are characterized by great animation and fidelity to nature and graceful arrangement of the draperies. He also excelled in perspective, which he learned under Brunelleschi. "Masaccio," says Fuseli, "was a genius, and the head of an epoch in the art. He may be considered as the precursor of Raphael, who imitated his principles and sometimes transcribed his figures." Among his most admired works are the frescos of San Pietro del Carmine at Florence, and the picture of "Christ Curing the Demoniacs." Masaccio died in 1443, and is generally supposed to have been poisoned.

Masaniello, mâ-sâ-ne-el'lo, or Tommaso Aniello, born at Amalfi, in Italy, in 1622, was the son of a fisherman, and in 1647 became leader of a revolt against the Duke of Arcos, Spanish Viceroy of Naples. At the head of 50,000 insurgents, he compelled the duke to abolish a tax which he had imposed, and also to give up the charter of exemption granted to Naples by Charles V. The intoxication produced by this sudden change of fortune seems to have affected the reason of Masaniello, and, having by his conduct alienated his friends, he was soon after assassinated by the adherents of the viceroy.

See TIRABOSCHI, "Storia della Letteratura Italiana."

Mascardi, (GIUSEPPE,) an Italian ecclesiastic and writer on jurisprudence, born at Sarzana, near Genoa, was an uncle of the preceding. Died in 1588.

Mascaron, mȧs'kȧ'rôN', (JULES,) an eminent French prelate and pulpit orator, born at Aix in 1634. He acquired a high reputation by his funeral oration on Anne of Austria, (1666,) and was soon after appointed preacher-in-ordinary to Louis XIV. He was created Bishop of Tul'e in 1671, and of Agen in 1679. He is said to have converted many Calvinists in the latter diocese to Catholicism. He died in 1703, leaving all his property to the poor, to whom his virtues had greatly endeared him. A volume of his "Funeral Orations" was published in 1704. That on Marshal Turenne is eulogized by La Harpe as a master-piece.

Masch, mȧsh, (ANDREAS GOTTLIEB,) a German writer and theologian, born in Mecklenburg in 1724. He published, besides other works, "Contributions towards the History of Remarkable Books," (1769,) and an excellent edition of Lelong's "Bibliotheca Sacra." Died in 1807.

Mascheroni, mȧs-kȧ-ro'nee, (LORENZO,) an Italian mathematician, born near Bérgamo in 1750. He became professor of Greek at Pavía, and subsequently of geometry at Bérgamo. On the invasion of Italy by the French, he was elected a member of the legislative body in the Cisalpine Republic. He published "Researches on the Equilibrium of Vaults," (1785,) and other mathematical treatises of a high character, also a curious work called "The Geometry of the Compass," (1797,) and a number of poems. Died in Paris in 1800.

Masclef, mȧs'klĕf', (FRANÇOIS,) a French Orientalist, born at Amiens in 1662. He published a "Hebrew Grammar," ("Grammatica Hebraica,") in which he opposes the use of vowel-points. It is regarded as one of the best works of the kind. Died in 1728.

See QUÉRARD, "La France Littéraire."

Mascov, mȧs'kof, (GOTTFRIED,) a German jurist, born at Dantzic in 1698. He lectured at Göttingen, and published several works. Died in 1760.

Mascov, [Lat. MASCO'VIUS,] (JOHANN JACOB,) a German jurist and historian, born at Dantzic in 1689, was a brother of the preceding. He became professor of law at Leipsic in 1719, and was the author of a treatise "On the Origin and Progress of Public Law," and other legal works, in Latin. He also wrote a "History of Germany to the Commencement of the Franconian Monarchy," (unfinished.) Died in 1761.

See "Memoria J. J. Mascovii," Leipsic, 1761.

Mascrier, Le, leh mȧs'kre-ā', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French littérateur, born at Caen in 1697. He assisted in the translation of De Thou's "Universal History," and published several original works. Died in 1760.

Masdeu, mȧs'dĕ-oo, (JUAN FRANCISCO,) a Spanish Jesuit and historian, was born at Barcelona in 1740. He wrote a "Critical History of Spain and of Spanish Culture in every Department." (20 vols., 1783–1800,) which has a high reputation for learning and accuracy. Died in 1817.

Masen. See MASENIUS.

Masenius, mȧ-sā'ne-us, or Masen, mȧ'sen, (JAMES,) a Flemish writer, born in the duchy of Juliers in 1606. He became professor of eloquence in the college of Cologne, and was the author of a Latin poem entitled "Sarcotis," or "Sarcothea," which, it is pretended by Lauder, suggested to Milton the idea of "Paradise Lost." Died in 1681.

Masères or Mazères, mȧ'zaiR', (FRANCIS,) BARON, a distinguished mathematician, of French extraction, born in London in 1731. He was for a time attorney-general for Canada, and in 1773 was appointed cursitor-baron of the exchequer. He was the author of a "Dissertation on the Use of the Negative Sign in Algebra," and other similar works, and reprinted at his own expense a collection of the writings of Kepler and other mathematicians, also one containing the optical works of Descartes, Huyghens, Gregory, and Halley. The latter was completed by Mr. Babbage. He was recorder of the city of London for about forty years. Died in 1824.

See "Gentleman's Magazine," 1824.

Masers de Latude, mȧ'zaiR' deh lȧ'tüd', (HENRI,) was born in Languedoc in 1725. Having given offence to Madame de Pompadour, he was by her orders imprisoned in the Bastille. After remaining captive nearly three years, he effected his escape, (1756,) with the assistance of a fellow-prisoner and by means of the most persevering toil. He was soon arrested, with his companion, D'Alègre, and, after suffering an imprisonment of thirty years, was at length released, by the efforts of Madame Legros, who interested Cardinal Rohan, Madame Necker, and others, in his behalf. His "Memoirs" were published by M. Thierry. Died in 1805.

See THIERRY, "Le Despotisme dévoilé, ou Mémoires de Latude," 3 vols., 1792.

Mash'ȧm, (ABIGAIL HILL,) born in London about 1670, was a cousin of the celebrated Duchess of Marlborough, upon whose recommendation she became waiting-maid to the princess, afterwards Queen Anne. She continued in this post after Anne ascended the throne, and by her arts supplanted the Duchess of Marlborough in the royal favour. She was married in 1707 to Mr. Masham, who was made a peer in 1711. It appears that her influence raised Harley and the Tories to power in 1710, deprived the Duke of Marlborough of the command of the army, (1712,) and made important changes in the politics of Europe. In allusion to her intrigues, Macaulay says, "The great party which had long swayed the destinies of Europe was undermined by bedchamber-women." Died in 1734.

See MACAULAY'S Review of LORD MAHON'S "History of the War of the Succession."

Masham, (Lady DAMARIS,) the daughter of Dr. Ralph Cudworth, born at Cambridge, England, in 1658, was married to Sir Francis Masham, of Essex. She was distinguished for her piety and for her attainments in history, philosophy, and divinity. She was a friend and pupil of the celebrated Locke, who died at her house, having resided there for some time. Lady Masham wrote several religious treatises. Died in 1708.

See LORD KING, "Life of Locke."

Mas-ĭ-nis'sȧ, [Gr. Μασσανάσσης,] King of Numidia, the son of Gula, who reigned in Massylia, was born about 250 B.C. In the second Punic war he fought at first for the Carthaginians in Spain, but, having been generously treated by Scipio Africanus, he became a zealous and faithful ally of the Romans. He waged war with Syphax, a Numidian prince, and was defeated by him twice. The Romans under Scipio came to his assistance, and in 203 the allies gained a decisive victory. Among the captives was the charming Sophonisba, a Carthaginian lady, whom Masinissa married. Being sternly reproved by Scipio for this impolitic act, he sent her a cup of poison, which she drank, it is said, with heroic spirit. He contributed to the victory of the Romans at the battle of Zama, and was rewarded with the kingdom of Numidia. He is said to have been a wise ruler and to have done much to civilize his subjects. He died about the age of ninety-seven, leaving the kingdom, under the guardianship of Scipio Æmilianus, to his three sons, Micipsa, Gulussa, and Mastanabal.

Mas'kęll, (WILLIAM,) an English author, born in Bath in 1814. He graduated in 1836 at University College, Oxford, was (1837–50) an Anglican clergyman, but on account of the famous Gorham controversy became in 1850 a Roman Catholic layman. Among his works are "The Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England," (1844; new edition, 1882,) "Monumenta Ritualia," (1845; new edition, 1882,) "Dissertation on Holy Baptism," (1848,) "Odds and Ends," (1872,) "Ancient and Mediæval Ivories," (1872,) etc. Died April 12, 1890.

Mas'kę-lyne, (NEVIL,) an English astronomer of great merit, born in London in 1732. He was sent to Saint Helena in 1761 to observe the transit of Venus, in which enterprise he failed because the sun was obscured by clouds. In 1765 he succeeded Mr. Bliss as astronomer royal. He originated the "Nautical Almanack," (1767,) and superintended its publication till his death. It acquired a high reputation in Europe, and was styled by Lalande "the most perfect Ephemeris that had ever been made." For forty-seven years Maskelyne made exact observations of the sky at Greenwich, and was the first to give a standard catalogue of stars, (1790.) In 1772 he visited Scotland, in order to ascertain the density of the earth by observing the effect of the mountain Schehallien upon the plumb-line. He was the author of several astronomical treatises in the "Philosophical Transactions," and was a Fellow of the Royal Society. He was also a foreign associate of the Academy of Sciences in Paris. Died in 1811.

Mā'sọn, (ARMISTEAD THOMSON,) a son of Stevens T. Mason, (1760–1803,) was born in Loudon county, Virginia, in 1787. He was chosen a Senator of the United States by the Democrats in 1815, and was killed in a duel by J. M. McCarty in 1819.

Mā'sọn, (CHARLES,) an English astronomer, who assisted Dr. Bradley in the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. He published an improved edition of Mayer's "Lunar Tables," and, in company with Mr. Dixon, was sent to America to determine the limits of Maryland and Pennsylvania. They measured a degree of the meridian, and in 1768 Dr. Maskelyne published an account of their operations in the "Philosophical Transactions" for that year. Died in 1787.

Mason, (FRANCIS,) an English clergyman, born at Durham in 1566, became Archdeacon of Norwich. He published a "Defence of the Anglican Church," ("Vindiciæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ.") Died in 1621.

Mason, (FRANCIS,) D.D., a learned Baptist divine and missionary, born at York, England, in 1799. Having emigrated to America, he studied theology at Newton, Massachusetts, and sailed for India in 1830. He published a "Memoir of Mrs. Helen M. Mason," (1847,) "Burmah, its People and Natural Productions," (1852,) "Life of Kotha-byu, the Karen Apostle," a translation of the Bible into the Karen language, (1853,) and other works. He was also editor of a Karen journal, entitled "The Morning Star." He died March 3, 1874.

Mason, (GEORGE,) COLONEL, an English statesman and soldier under the reigns of Charles I. and Charles II., emigrated to America about 1654, and settled in Virginia. Died in 1686.

Mason, (GEORGE,) an American statesman, a descendant of the preceding, was born in Stafford county, now Fairfax county, Virginia, in 1726. He wrote the Declaration of Rights and the Constitution of Virginia, (1776,) after which he served in the legislature. In 1777 he was elected to the Continental Congress. He was reputed one of the ablest debaters that Virginia ever produced. He was a member of the national convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, but he refused to sign that Constitution, and vehemently opposed its adoption in the Virginia Assembly, for the alleged reason that it tended to monarchy. He was highly eulogized by Jefferson. Died in 1792.

Mason, (GEORGE,) an English littérateur, who wrote a "Life of Lord Howe," an "Answer to Thomas Paine," and an "Essay on Designs in Gardening." Died in 1806.

Mason, (GEORGE HEMMING,) an English artist, born at Whitley, in Staffordshire, in 1818. He studied medicine, but abandoned that profession for art, working mostly at Rome. His pictures are realistic presentations of homely and unambitious scenes, but, notwithstanding the fine poetic qualities of his works, they were not popular during his lifetime. Died October 22, 1872.

Mason, (JAMES,) a distinguished English engraver, born about 1710, executed a number of landscapes after Claude Lorrain, G. Poussin, Hobbema, and other artists Died about 1780.

Mason, (JAMES MURRAY,) an American Democratic politician, born in Fairfax county, Virginia, about 1798. He became a member of Congress in 1837, and was elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of Virginia in 1847. He continued to be a member of the Senate for fourteen years, and was the author of the fugitive-slave law of 1850. He was sent with J. Slidell on a mission to England by Jefferson Davis in 1861. During the passage in the steamer Trent they were seized by Captain Wilkes, of the Federal navy, in November, 1861. They were claimed by the British government, and were liberated in January, 1862, after which Mr. Mason passed several years in England, remaining abroad during the civil war. Died in 1871.

Mason, (JEREMIAH,) an American statesman and lawyer of high reputation, born at Lebanon, Connecticut, in April, 1768, graduated at Yale College. He practised law many years at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, to which he removed in 1797. He was a Federalist, and a friend of Daniel Webster, who expressed a very high opinion of him. He represented New Hampshire in the Senate of the United States from 1813 to 1817. In 1832 he removed to Boston, where he died in October, 1848. He was considered in the early part of the present century to be the foremost lawyer in New England.

Mason, (Sir JOHN,) an English statesman, born at Abingdon in 1500. He was privy councillor in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth. Died in 1566.

Mason, (JOHN,) a native of England, born in 1600, emigrated to America, where he became Deputy Governor of Connecticut. He was the author of a "History of the Pequot War." Died in 1672.

See G. E. ELLIS, "Life of John Mason," in SPARKS'S "American Biography," vol. iii., 2d series.

Mason, (JOHN,) an English divine and religious writer, born in Essex in 1706, was the author of a popular work, entitled "Self-Knowledge," (1745,) which was translated into several languages. Died in 1763.

Mason, (JOHN MITCHELL,) a celebrated American theologian and pulpit orator, born in New York in 1770. He graduated at Columbia College in 1789, and subsequently finished his theological studies in Edinburgh. In 1793 he succeeded his father as pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in Cedar Street, New York, where he attracted great numbers by his eloquence. He was the founder of the first theological seminary in the United States, of which he was appointed professor. He became editor of the "Christian's Magazine" in 1807, and was elected in 1811 provost of Columbia College, and in 1821 president of Dickinson College, Pennsylvania. Among his most admired writings is his "Oration on the Death of Alexander Hamilton," who was his intimate friend. Dr. Mason died in 1829. His works (in 4 vols.) were edited by his son, the Rev. Ebenezer Mason.

Mason, (JOHN THOMSON,) an American lawyer and statesman, son of Thomson Mason, noticed below, was born in Stafford county, Virginia, in 1764. He was a personal friend of Jefferson, who appointed him to several high offices. Died in 1824.

Mason, (JOHN THOMSON,) son of the preceding, born in Washington county, Maryland, in 1815, became collector of the port of Baltimore under President Buchanan.

Mason, (JOHN Y.,) born in Sussex county, Virginia, about 1795, was secretary of the navy under President Tyler, and attorney-general and secretary of the navy (1846–49) under President Polk. He was afterwards appointed minister to France by President Pierce. Died in Paris in 1859.

Mason, (LOWELL,) an American composer and teacher of music, born at Medfield, Massachusetts, in 1792. He received the degree of doctor in music from the New York University in 1855. He was a contributor to the "Musical Review," and published numerous works on music, both original and compiled. Died Aug. 11, 1872.

Mason, (RICHARD B.,) grandson of George Mason, noticed above, served with distinction in the Mexican war of 1848, and became civil and military Governor of California. Died in 1850.

Mason, (STEVENS THOMSON,) a nephew of George Mason, was born in Virginia in 1760. He served in the war of the Revolution, and was elected to the United States Senate in 1794. Died in 1803.

Mason, (STEVENS THOMSON,) grandson of the preceding, was born in Loudoun county, Virginia, in 1811. He was elected in 1835 first Governor of the State of Michigan. Died January 4, 1843.

Mason, (THOMSON,) younger brother of George Mason, noticed above, was born in 1730. He distinguished himself as a jurist and a patriot, and was the author of several able political essays. Died in 1785.

Mason, (WILLIAM,) an English poet, born at Hull in 1725. He was chosen a Fellow of Pembroke College in 1747, and, after taking orders, became chaplain to the king. Mason is chiefly remembered as the friend and biographer of the poet Gray. His principal works are two tragedies, entitled "Elfrida" and "Caractacus," several odes, and "The English Garden," a descriptive poem. He was also distinguished for his skill in painting and music. Died in 1797.

Masoodee Alee-Abool-Hassan, Mas'ûdî Alî-Abul-Hassan, or Masoudy Ali-Aboul-Hassan, mȧ-soo'dee ȧ'lee' ȧ'bo͞ol' hȧs'sȧn, often called Al-Masoodee, (or Al-Mas'ûdî,) an eminent Arabian historian, born at Bagdâd in the ninth century. His profound and various attainments in almost every department of knowledge have obtained for him the admiration of Europeans as well as of his own countrymen. He travelled over a great part of Asia, and as far west as Morocco and Spain. Among his most important works are his "History of the Times," and his "Meadows of Gold and Mines of Gems," the latter of which comprises the history, politics, religion, and geography of Eastern and European nations. Masoodee is supposed to have died at Cairo, in 956 A.D.

Maspero, mȧs'pȧ'rō', (GASTON CAMILLE CHARLES,) a French Egyptologist, born in Paris, June 24, 1846. He studied at the Lycée Louis-le-Grand and the École Normale, and in 1874 became professor of Egyptian archæology and philosophy in the Collége de France. He has published translations of various papyri, and many memoirs on archæological questions, besides "De Carchemis Situ et Historia," (1873,) "Histoire ancienne des Peuples de l'Orient," (1875,) and other works.

Masque de Fer, măsk dẹh fĕr, (L'Homme au, lom ō,) (the "Man with the Iron Mask,") an unknown person, who in 1662 was imprisoned in the château of Pignerol, afterwards conveyed to the isle of Sainte-Marguerite, and in 1698 to the Bastille, where he died in 1703. Various conjectures have been formed concerning this mysterious prisoner, who was evidently a person of high rank and refined tastes. Some writers have supposed him to have been a twin brother of Louis XIV.; others, that he was the Count of Vermandois, the Duke of Beaufort, or Count Mattioli.

Massaria, mȧs-sȧ-ree'ȧ, (ALESSANDRO,) a learned Italian physician, born at Vicenza about 1510. He studied under Fracantianus and Fallopius, and in 1587 succeeded Mercuriale as professor of medicine in the University of Padua. He was the author of a "Treatise on the Plague" and a "Treatise on Bleeding," which are highly esteemed. Died in 1598.

See PORTAL, "Histoire de l'Anatomie."

Mas'sas-soit, an Indian chief of the Womponoags, born in Massachusetts. In 1621 he formed a league with the colonists at Plymouth, which was never violated. He was the father of the celebrated warrior King Philip. Died in 1661.

Massé, mȧ'sȧ', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French artist, born in Paris in 1687, engraved the pictures which Lebrun had executed for the gallery of Versailles. Massé became painter to Louis XV. Died in 1767.

Massé, mȧ'sȧ', (VICTOR,) a French musical composer, born at Lorient, March 7, 1822. He was educated at the Paris Conservatory, taking the prix de Rome in 1844. His first work for the stage, the operetta of "La Chanteuse voilée," (1852,) was at once successful, and he followed it up with a large number of pieces for the stage. The best-known of these are "Galatea," "The Seasons," and "Paul and Virginia." The last is the only one of his operas well known in this country. Died July 6, 1884.

Masséna, mȧ'sȧ'nȧ', [It. MASSENA, mȧs-sā'nȧ,] (AN-DRÉ,) Prince of Essling, Duke of Rivoli, and one of the most distinguished marshals of Napoleon I., was born of Jewish parentage at Nice in 1758. He enlisted in 1775 as a private of the royal Italian regiment, from which he retired at the expiration of fourteen years, having attained no higher rank than that of a sergeant. At the beginning of the French Revolution he again entered the army, and in a short time was successively promoted to the rank of colonel, general of brigade, and general of division. In 1794 he gained a victory over the Austrians near Tanaro, took Ormea, and rendered efficient service at the battle of Saorgio. The following year, while serving under General Schérer, he drove the Austrians from their position at Vado and gained over them the decisive victory of Loano. In 1796 he acquired great distinction at the engagements of Montenotte, Millesimo, Castiglione, and Arcola. His gallant conduct at the battle of Rivoli, in 1797, subsequently procured for him the title of Duke of Rivoli. The next year he was appointed to the command of the army in the Papal States; but his rapacity and avarice excited so great hostility both in his soldiers and in the inhabitants that he was soon after compelled to resign. In 1799, as commander-in-chief of the armies of Switzerland and the Danube, he exhibited the highest order of military talent, especially at Zurich, where he gained an important and brilliant victory over the Russians. In 1804 he was created a marshal of France. The next year he was sent to Italy, to command against the Archduke Charles, whom he finally succeeded in driving back into Germany. In 1806 he reduced the insurgent Calabrians to subjection, took the fortress of Gaëta, and enabled Joseph Bonaparte to seat himself firmly upon the Neapolitan throne. He reaped further laurels in 1809, at the battles of Landshut and Eckmühl and by the capture of the fortress of Ebersdorf. The same year he was created Prince of Essling, for his distinguished services at the battle of that place. Masséna was appointed in 1810 general-in-chief of the army in Portugal, where, although he exhibited his usual courage and military skill, he was ultimately obliged to yield to the superior genius of Sir Arthur Wellesley. He has, however, received the highest commendation from English as well as French historians for the strategic skill with which he conducted his retreat into Spain. In 1812 Marmont was appointed to succeed him. The year following, Masséna joined the Bourbons. He acknowledged the authority of Napoleon when he returned from Elba, but took no part in the affairs of government during the Hundred Days. He was subsequently appointed commander-in-chief of the National Guard in Paris, and also received several marks of distinction from Louis XVIII. He died in Paris, April 4, 1817.

Massieu, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French ecclesiastic, born in Picardy, became constitutional Bishop of L'Oise in 1791. He voted for the death of Louis XVI. in the National Convention. Died in 1818.

Massillon, mȧ'sèl'yôN' or mȧ'se'yôN', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French pulpit orator of great celebrity, born at Hières, in Provence, in 1663. He was educated in the college of that town, and became a priest of the Oratory. After professing belles-lettres and theology at Montbrison and Vienne, and pronouncing some funeral orations, he was called to Paris in 1696 to direct the Seminary of Saint-Magloire. His talent was gradually developed by the ecclesiastic conferences which he composed at this period. He admired the austere eloquence of Bourdaloue, but chose for himself a different style, characterized by profound pathos and an insight into the most secret motives of the human heart. In 1699 he preached at Paris the Lent sermon, which was warmly applauded. The same year he was chosen to preach the Advent at court, on which occasion Louis XIV. said to him, "I have heard many great orators and been pleased with them; but after hearing you I am displeased with myself." The death of Bossuet and Bourdaloue, in 1704, left him at the head of French pulpit orators. In this year he again preached before Louis XIV., whose funeral oration he pronounced in 1715. He was appointed Bishop of Clermont in 1717, and preached before the young king the Lent sermon called "Petit-Carême," which is esteemed his master-piece. His diction is noble, simple, and unaffected. Voltaire kept a volume of his sermons constantly on his desk, as a model of eloquence. Massillon was admitted into the French Academy in 1719. In the government of his diocese he was moderate, charitable, and conciliatory. He died in 1742. His published works consist of Sermons, Ecclesiastical Conferences, Paraphrases of certain Psalms, Letters, etc. Voltaire thought him "the preacher who best understood the world,—whose eloquence savoured of the courtier, the academician, the wit, and the philosopher."

Mas'sin-ġẹr, (PHILIP,) an eminent English dramatic poet, was born at Salisbury in 1584. In his eighteenth year he entered Saint Alban's Hall, Oxford, supported by the Earl of Pembroke. Here, according to Anthony Wood, "he spent his time in reading poetry and romances instead of logic and philosophy, which he ought to have done, as he was patronized to that end." He became a resident of London about 1606, and assisted Fletcher in the composition of several dramas. The first production of Massinger was the "Virgin Martyr," (1622.) Eighteen of his dramas are extant, mostly tragedies and tragi-comedies. Among the most admired are "The City Madam," "The Maid of Honour," "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," and "The Fatal Dowry." The latter has given to Rowe the outline of the "Fair Penitent." Massinger's dramas are remarkably free from profanity; and the coarseness which disfigures some of them is probably to be attributed to his coadjutors. He is said to have been the only dramatist of that time who rejected the doctrine of the divine right of kings. Died in 1640.

Massmann, mâs'mân, (HANS FERDINAND,) a German scholar, born at Berlin in 1797. He published an edition of the "Explanation of the Gospel of Saint John" in Gothic.

Massolino, da, dâ mâs-so-lee'no, (PANICALE, pâ-nekâ'lâ,) an Italian painter, born near Florence in 1378. His master-pieces are the pictures in the chapel of San Pietro al Carmine, representing leading incidents in the life of Saint Peter. He numbered among his pupils the celebrated Masaccio. Died in 1415.

See VASARI, "Lives of the Painters," etc.

Masson. See LATOMUS.

Masson, mă'sôN', (ANTOINE,) a French engraver, born near Orléans in 1636. He excelled particularly in representing colour and the different textures of objects. His print of the "Disciples at Emmaus," after Titian, is esteemed one of his master-pieces, though not free from a fantastic style of executing the hair, peculiar to himself. Masson was also a painter, and his engravings from his own portraits, as well as from those of other artists, are greatly admired, many of them representing the most distinguished men of that time. He was engraver-in-ordinary to the king. Died in 1702.

His daughter, MADELÈNE MASSON, born in 1666, was a skilful imitator of her father's style, and executed the portraits of Maria Theresa, the Duchess d'Alençon, and several others.

Math'ẹr, (COTTON,) D.D., a celebrated American theologian and writer, born at Boston in 1663, was a son of Increase Mather, noticed below. He was ordained as a minister in 1684, and preached in Boston. Among his principal works are "The Wonders of the Invisible World," (1693,) "Magnalia Christi Americana, or The Ecclesiastical History of New England," (1702,) "Essays to do Good," (1710,) "Psalterium Americanum," (1718,) "The Christian Philosopher," (1721,) and "Illustrations of the Sacred Scriptures," (in manuscript.) His character exhibits a remarkable compound of ardent piety, (which, however, was not without a tincture of self-conceit,) uncommon activity, and force of intellect joined to a credulity which, even in that age, had scarcely any parallel among educated men. From the first he was eager to bring to trial and punishment those supposed to be guilty of witchcraft, and, when others began clearly to see the folly and injustice of these cruel persecutions, he earnestly, though vainly, strove to stem the reaction in the popular mind. Died in 1728.

She was married in 1110 to Henry V. of Germany, who died in 1125. About 1127 she became the wife of Geoffrey Plantagenet, Count of Anjou, and was recognized by her father as his successor. On the death of Henry (1135) her title was disputed by Stephen of Blois, and a long civil war ensued between them. Matilda prevailed in 1141, and was crowned in London. She was the mother of Henry II. Died in 1167.

See MATTHEW PARIS, "Historia major."

Matilda, daughter of Boniface III., Marquis of Tuscany, was born about 1046. She was first married to Godfrey le Bossu, son of the Duke of Lorraine. He died in 1076, and, her mother having died the same year, Matilda came into possession of her vast estates, including the greater part of Northern Italy. In the contest for supremacy between Pope Gregory VII. and the Emperor of Germany, she espoused with great zeal the cause of the former; and it was at her castle of Canossa that Henry IV. underwent the humiliating penance imposed by the pope. In 1077 she made a reversionary grant of all her dominions to the Church of Rome. She was married in 1089 to Guelph, Duke of Bavaria, from whom she was divorced in 1095. Died in 1115.

Matthias, ma-thī'ass, [Ger. pron. mât-tee'âss; It. MATTIA, mât-tee'â,] Emperor of Germany, born in 1557, was the son of Maximilian II. and Mary, daughter of Charles V. He was invited in 1578, by the Catholics of the Netherlands, to assume the government of that country, which office he soon resigned. He was appointed Stadtholder of Austria in 1595, and in 1611 was invited by the Bohemians to become their ruler. On the death of his brother Rudolf, Emperor of Germany, in 1612, Matthias succeeded to the throne. In the ensuing contest between the Protestant and Catholic factions he pursued a vacillating policy, and while striving to direct made himself distrusted by both. He concluded a disadvantageous treaty with the Turks, then in possession of Hungary, (1615,) and soon after caused his cousin Ferdinand to be proclaimed King of Bohemia and Hungary. (See FERDINAND II.) Matthias died in 1619, in the midst of the dissensions which preceded the Thirty Years' war.

In 1546 he formed a secret alliance with the emperor Charles V. against the Protestant League of Schmalkalden, with a design to supplant John Frederick as Elector of Saxony, whose dominions he invaded with success. The title of elector was transferred to him by Charles V. In consequence of his unexpected hostility to the Protestants, the Imperial army gained a decisive victory at Mühlberg in April, 1547, and the Protestant cause was apparently ruined. Having changed his policy, and formed, in 1551, a secret treaty with Henry II. of France, Maurice, aided by several German princes, in the spring of 1552 took arms for the assertion of religious liberty, and marched against Charles V., who was at Innspruck. Surprised by this sudden movement, Charles was compelled to retreat, the Council of Trent was dispersed in confusion, and hostilities were terminated by the memorable treaty of Passau, August 22, 1552, which secured religious liberty to the Protestants of Germany. Maurice was killed in a battle against Albert of Brandenburg, at Sievershausen, in July, 1553.

Mauriceau, mō're'sō', (FRANÇOIS,) a French physician, born in Paris, published a "Treatise on the Diseases of Pregnancy," which was translated into several languages. Died in 1709.

Mauricianus, mau-rish-ĭ-ā'nus, (JUNIUS,) a Roman jurist under the reign of Antoninus Pius.

Mauricius or Mauritius, mau-rish'ĭ-us, [Gr. Μαυρίκιος; Fr. MAURICE, mō'rèss'; It. MAURISIO, mŏw-ree'se-o,] (FLAVIUS TIBERIUS,) Emperor of the East, born in Cappadocia in 539 A.D. Having been appointed by the emperor Tiberius commander of his armies against the Persians, he gained several important victories, and was, on his return, rewarded by Tiberius with his daughter's hand. After carrying on war for some time with the Abares, a barbarous tribe on the Danube, a mutiny broke out among his soldiers, who chose for their leader a centurion named Phocas. Mauritius was put to death, having previously witnessed the execution of five of his sons, (602.)

Maury, mō're', (JEAN SIFFREIN,) a celebrated French prelate and pulpit orator, born in the Venaissin in 1746.

He repaired to Paris about 1766, and soon acquired a high reputation by his "Funeral Oration on the Dauphin," and his "Eulogy of Fénelon." He published in 1777 his "Treatise on Pulpit Eloquence," and in 1778 was appointed to preach the Carême (Lent) sermon before the king. His "Panegyric on Saint Vincent de Paul," which is esteemed his master-piece, appeared in 1785, and he was soon after chosen a member of the French Academy. In 1789 he was a deputy of the clergy of Péronne to the States-General, where he was conspicuous as the eloquent advocate of the Church and of the royalist party and the most powerful opponent of Mirabeau. On the dissolution of the Constituent Assembly he was obliged to leave the country, and at the invitation of Pius VI. he took up his residence at Rome, where he was made a cardinal in 1794. In 1804 he wrote a letter of congratulation to the emperor Napoleon, and henceforth attached himself to the interests of the new sovereign. He was successively created by him a member of the Institute, first almoner of Jerome Bonaparte, and Archbishop of Paris, (1810.) After the restoration of the Bourbons, Cardinal Maury was deprived of his place, and retired to Rome, where he died in 1817. Maury was noted for his brilliant repartee, of which the following instances may be given. Being asked by Napoleon how he stood with regard to the Bourbons, he replied, "Sire, my respect for them is unalterable; but I have lost faith and hope, and there remains to me only charity." Once, in the Assembly, some ladies of rank, known for their republican opinions, attempted by their loud conversation to drown his voice, when, turning to the president, he said, "I pray you silence those Sans-culottes."

Maury, mŏw-ree', (JUAN MARIA,) a Spanish poet and critic, born at Malaga, published in 1826 a collection of Spanish lyrics, entitled "Poetical Spain," ("Espagne poétique,") which were translated into elegant French verse and accompanied with critical and biographical notices. Died in 1845.

Maury, (LOUIS FERDINAND ALFRED,) a French antiquarian writer, born at Meaux in 1817. He became a member of the Academy of Sciences in 1857. He published a number of works, the most valuable of which is his "History of the Religions of Ancient Greece," (3 vols., 1857.)

Mau'rў, (MATTHEW FONTAINE,) LL.D., an American hydrographer and naval officer, born in Spottsylvania county, Virginia, in 1806. About 1826 he sailed in the Vincennes on a voyage around the world, and after his return was made a lieutenant in 1836. He published a "Treatise on Navigation," (about 1835,) "Letters on the Amazon and the Atlantic Slopes of South America," "Relation between Magnetism and the Circulation of the Atmosphere," "Astronomical Observations," (1853,) and "Physical Geography of the Sea," (1855; sixth edition, 1856,) a work which has been highly praised by competent judges. Died February 1, 1873.

See the "North British Review" for May, 1858.

Mau-so'lus, [Gr. Μαύσωλος; Fr. MAUSOLE, mō'zol',] son of Hecatomnus, became King of Caria, in Asia Minor, about 377 B.C., being, however, nominally a satrap of the Persian empire. He made considerable conquests in Persia and in different parts of Greece, and was, according to Demosthenes, one of the instigators of the Social war. From his name is derived the word "mausoleum." The colossal statue of Mausolus, now in the British Museum, is one of the finest extant relics of ancient art. (See ARTEMISIA.)

Mavrocordatos, mȧv-ro-kor-dȧ'tos, or Mavrocordato, mȧv-ro-kor-dȧ'to, (ALEXANDER,) a modern Greek physician, statesman, and scholar, born about 1636. He studied at Rome and Padua, and took his medical degree at Bologna. Having settled at Constantinople, his profound knowledge of both Oriental and European languages procured for him the post of grand dragoman to the Ottoman Porte, (1673.) He was afterwards employed in important embassies to Vienna, and negotiated the treaty of Carlowitz, (1698.) His services to Austria on this occasion were rewarded by the emperor Leopold with the title of count of the empire, while he was appointed secretary of state by the Sultan, and obtained other distinctions. He was the author of a medical work entitled "Pneumaticum Instrumentum," etc., which was translated into French, German, and Spanish, a "Modern Greek Grammar," and a collection of letters. Died in 1709.

See VON HAMMER, "Geschichte des Osmanischen Reichs;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Mavrocordatos, (ALEXANDER,) a Greek statesman, born at Constantinople in 1791. He took arms against the Turks in 1821, and was appointed president of the executive committee in January, 1822, soon after which he took command of the army. Having been rendered almost powerless by the dissensions among the Greeks and by the enmity of Colocotronis and Ypsilanti, he resigned or refused the office of president in 1823. In 1832 he was appointed a member of the cabinet by King Otho, whom he served as ambassador to Munich, Berlin, and London between 1834 and 1840. He was prime minister for a short time in 1841, and president of the council in 1844. About May, 1854, he was restored to power, which he resigned a few months later. Died in 1865.

Maxentius, maks-ĕn'shę-us, [Fr. MAXENCE, mȧk'sôNss',] (MARCUS AURELIUS VALERIUS,) a Roman emperor, was the son of Maximian, who abdicated in 305 A.D. He married the daughter of the emperor Galerius. He thought himself slighted by the promotion of Constantine to the rank of Cæsar in 306, and excited a revolt among the Prætorian guards, who proclaimed him emperor at Rome in the same year. Galerius, who was then in a distant province, sent against him an army under Severus, who was defeated and killed by the aid of Maximian. Maxentius and his father reigned together for a short time, and made an alliance with Constantine, who married Fausta, a sister of Maxentius. Maximian was expelled from Rome in 308, in consequence of a quarrel with his son. In 312 the army of Constantine defeated that of Maxentius, who, in the retreat, was drowned in the Tiber.

Max-im'ĭ-an, [Fr. MAXIMIEN, mȧk'se'me-ȧN'; Lat. MAXIMIA'NUS,] or, more fully, Mar'cus Vale'rius Maximia'nus, a Roman emperor, born in Pannonia, was the son of a peasant. He had obtained high rank in the army when Diocletian, in 286 A.D., adopted him as his colleague in the empire. In the division of the empire, Italy and Africa were assigned to Maximian. In 305 Diocletian and Maximian formally abdicated in favour of Galerius and Constantius Chlorus. The next year he joined his son Maxentius in an effort to recover power, and was proclaimed emperor. In the war that ensued between him and Constantine he was taken prisoner, and executed in 310. (See MAXENTIUS.)

Max-ĭ-mil'ĭ-an [Ger. pron. mȧk-se-mee'le-ȧn; Fr. MAXIMILIEN, mȧk'se'me'le'ȧN'; Lat. MAXIMILIA'NUS; It. MASSIMILIANO, mȧs-se-me-le-ȧ'no] I., Emperor of Germany, born at Neustadt in 1459, was the son of Frederick III. and Leonora of Portugal. He married, in 1477, Mary of Burgundy, daughter and heiress of Charles the Bold, who died in 1482, leaving two children, Philip and Margaret. In accordance with the stipulations of the peace of Arras, (1482,) he betrothed his daughter Margaret to the Dauphin, (afterwards Charles VIII. of France,) with Burgundy, Artois, and Flanders for her portion. For several years following he was involved in a contest with France, and with his subjects in the Netherlands, incited to revolt by Louis XI. About 1492 he prepared to make war on Charles VIII., who not only refused to keep his engagement with Maximilian's daughter, but had deprived him of his intended bride, Anne, the wealthy heiress of Brittany. By the mediation of Philip, Elector of the Palatinate, a treaty of peace was concluded between the two sovereigns at Senlis, (1493,) by which Charles was compelled to give up the dowry of the princess. Maximilian was crowned Emperor of Germany, and in 1494 married Bianca Sforza, daughter of the Duke of Milan, which alliance gave rise to a succession of wars in Italy. He soon after joined the League of Cambray, formed between Pope Julius II., Ferdinand of Spain, and Louis XII. of France, against the Venetians; but, that republic having soon after become reconciled to the pope, Maximilian joined the so-called Holy League between England, Spain, Venice, and the pope, in opposition to the French, who were signally defeated by the forces of Henry VIII. and the emperor, in the "battle of the spurs," near Guinegate, (1513.) Francis I., having succeeded to the throne of France, captured Milan, and compelled Maximilian to give up Verona to the Venetians for 200,000 ducats. By the treaty of Bâle (1499) he had been obliged to acknowledge the independence of Switzerland. Though often unsuccessful in his wars, he had the fortune to acquire extensive territories by the marriage of his son Philip with the Infanta of Spain, and of his grandchildren Ferdinand and Maria with the son and daughter of Ladislaus, King of Hungary and Bohemia. His daughter Margaret was married to the Spanish prince Don Juan, a son of Ferdinand and Isabella. Among the important acts of his reign were the establishment of the Imperial Chamber and Aulic Council, and the abolition of the Secret Tribunal of Westphalia; he also created a standing army and introduced military discipline. He was a liberal patron of learned men, and was the author of several works in prose and verse. He died in January, 1519, and was succeeded by his grandson, Charles V.

Maximilian II., born in 1527, was the son of Ferdinand I., whom he succeeded in 1564 as Emperor of Germany. He was soon after engaged in a war with the Turks, who had established themselves in Hungary. After the death of Solyman II. a truce of eight years was concluded between his successor and the emperor. Maximilian was favourably inclined towards the Protestants, whom he allowed to fill important offices; but the influence of the pope, the King of Spain, and the Catholic princes of Germany prevented him from formally embracing their doctrines. He died in 1576, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Rudolph.

Maximilian I., Elector of Bavaria, born in 1573. On the formation by the Protestants of the confederacy called the Union, (1608,) Maximilian put himself at the head of the opposing Catholic faction of the League. In conjunction with the emperor Ferdinand II., he fought in the Thirty Years' war against the Palatine Frederick V., and conquered the Upper and Lower Palatinate. In 1623 he obtained the electoral dignity of the Palatinate and the hereditary domains of Frederick V. Maximilian was an able ruler, and founded a number of colleges and other useful institutions. Died in 1651.

See KARL MARIA VON ARETIN, "Geschichte des Herzogs und Kurfürsten Maximilian I.," 1842.

Maximilian II., (JOSEPH,) King of Bavaria, the eldest son of King Lewis, was born in 1811. He married in 1842 a daughter of Prince Frederick William of Prussia. In March, 1848, he succeeded his father, who abdicated the throne. He opposed the project to unite the German peoples into one nation or confederacy of which the King of Prussia should be the head. He died in March, 1864, and was succeeded by his son Lewis.

Maximilian, (FERDINAND JOSEPH,) Emperor of Mexico and Archduke of Austria, born in July, 1832, was a brother of the emperor Francis Joseph. He married Carlotta, or Charlotte, a daughter of Leopold, King of Belgium, about 1858. In 1859 he was appointed an admiral and commander-in-chief of the Austrian navy. In 1863 he was tempted by Napoleon III. to act the part of emperor in Mexico, then partly conquered by the French and partly governed by the republican President Juarez. He arrived at the Mexican capital in June, 1864. He issued a decree that all who adhered to the republic or resisted his authority should be shot. Many prisoners, including General Orteaga, accordingly suffered death by his order. According to the New York "Evening Post," July 1, 1867, he ordered the enslavement of the whole labouring population of Mexico. The United States refused to recognize him as emperor, and required Napoleon to withdraw his army. Maximilian was much embarrassed by the want of money, and offended the clerical party (which had favoured him) by refusing to restore the property of the Church, which had been confiscated by the Liberals. The French troops departed about the end of 1866, after which the republicans gained several victories and the empire quickly collapsed. Maximilian was captured at Quéretaro in May, and shot on the 19th of June, 1867.

Maximilian, (Alexander Philipp,) Prince of Neuwied, a German naturalist and traveller, born at Neuwied in 1782. In 1815 he set out on a journey through Brazil, where he spent two years and made a rich collection of specimens. On his return he published his "Travels in Brazil" and a "Description of the Natural History of Brazil." In 1833 he visited the western part of the United States. His "Journey through North America," a magnificent work, illustrated with eighty-one engravings, came out in 1843, and is said to be superior to anything of the kind that had hitherto appeared in Germany. Died in 1867.

Maximilian Joseph, "Duke in Bavaria," a German prince and author, the head of the ducal line of the Bavarian royal family, was born at Bamberg, December 4, 1808, and became a general of cavalry in the Bavarian army. He published "Wanderung nach Orient," "Novellen," "Skizzenbuch," etc., and compiled a collection of Bavarian popular songs and melodies. One of his daughters became Empress of Austria. Died in 1888.

Maximil'ian Mari'a Eman'uel, Elector of Bavaria, born in 1662, was a grandson of Maximilian I. In 1685 he married Maria Antonia, daughter of the emperor Leopold I., and was appointed in 1692 Governor of the Netherlands. Having taken part with the French in the war of the Spanish succession, he delivered up to them the Spanish Netherlands. After his defeat at the battle of Schellenberg, he was obliged by the emperor to give up his possessions, which, however, were restored at the peace of Baden in 1714. Died in 1726.

Max'ĭ-min, [Lat. Maximi'nus; Fr. Maximin, mȧk'-se'mȧN',] or, more fully, Cai'us Ju'lius Ve'rus Maximi'nus, a native of Thrace, born in 173 A.D., served in the Roman army under Septimius Severus. Having followed Alexander Severus in his German campaign, he caused him to be assassinated, A.D. 235, and was proclaimed emperor in his stead. In consequence of his cruelties, the province of Africa soon after revolted, and Gordianus was made emperor by the senate of Rome, A.D. 237. Maximinus, having defeated and slain Gordianus, laid siege to Aquileia, during which he was killed in a mutiny of his soldiers, together with his son, in 238 A.D. If we may trust the concurrent testimony of ancient writers, Maximin was above eight feet high, well proportioned, and of such strength that he could easily draw a loaded wagon, and with a kick break the leg of a horse. He is said to have used his wife's bracelet for a fingering.

See Tillemont, "Histoire des Empereurs."

Max-ĭ-mi'nus Dā'za, an Illyrian peasant, a relative of Galerius, was raised by him to the dignity of Cæsar, A.D. 305. He ruled over Syria and Egypt, and persecuted the Christians. On the death of Galerius, in 311, Maximinus took possession of all the Asiatic provinces. He afterwards made war on Licinius, but was defeated, and died by poison at Tarsus in 313 A.D.

Max'ĭ-mus, [Fr. Maxime, mȧk'sȅm'; It. Massimo, mȧs'se-mo,] (Magnus Clemens,) a usurper of the Roman empire, was a native of Spain. Having for several years commanded the Roman army in Britain with success, he revolted against Gratian about 381 A.D., and was proclaimed emperor by his soldiers. He then invaded Gaul to offer battle to Gratian, who was defeated, or fled without fighting, and was killed in 383. Theodosius and Valentinian recognized him as Emperor of Gaul, Spain, and Britain. Attempting to obtain Italy also by conquest, he was defeated by Theodosius, taken prisoner, and executed in 388 A.D.

See Le Beau, "Histoire du Bas-Empire;" Tillemont, "Histoire des Empereurs."

Maximus, [Fr. Maxime, mȧk'sȅm',] Saint, surnamed the Confessor and the Monk, an eminent Greek theologian, born at Constantinople about 580 A.D. He zealously opposed the heresy of the Monothelites, and wrote many works on theology, which were highly esteemed in the middle ages. Died in 662 A.D.

Max'ĭ-mus the Greek, a native of Albania, was invited to Russia by the grand duke Vassili Ivanovitch, in order to examine numerous Greek manuscripts recently discovered. He made translations of the principal ones into Latin, which were rendered by others into Slavonian. At the request of the Czar, he undertook to revise the early translations of the books of the Greek Church; but the numerous corrections which he made gave great offence, and he was excommunicated as a heretic in 1525. Died in 1556.

Max'well, (James Clerk,) an eminent British physicist, born at Edinburgh, June 13, 1831. He studied at the Universities of Edinburgh and Cambridge, graduating with highest honours in 1854. He was professor of natural philosophy in Marischal College, Aberdeen, 1856–60, professor of physics in King's College, London, 1860–68, and professor of experimental physics in the University of Cambridge, 1871–79. His life was full of fruitful labours in the field of experimental physics and applied mathematics. Among his works are an admirable "Theory of Heat," (1871,) "Matter and Motion," and "Electricity and Magnetism," (1873,) the latter a treatise of the highest value to science. Died at Cambridge, November 5, 1879.

Max'well, (Sir Murray,) a Scottish naval officer, born near Perth in 1766, served with distinction in several campaigns against the French and Spaniards, and in 1815 accompanied Lord Amherst on his embassy to China. He was made a knight in 1818. Died in 1831.

Mazarin, maz'ạ-reen', [Fr. pron. mă'zà'răN'; It. MAZARINI, mâd-zâ-ree'nee; Lat. MAZARI'NUS,] (GIULIO or JULES,) CARDINAL, a celebrated courtier and prime minister of France, was born in Italy in 1602. He was educated in a college of Jesuits at Rome, (where his father, Pietro Mazarini, resided,) and adopted the profession of law. He had acquired the reputation of an adroit negotiator in the service of the pope, when, in 1630, he met Cardinal Richelieu, who secured his attachment to the interest of France. When the French and Spanish were about to engage at Casal, he prevented a battle, and negotiated the treaty of Cherasco in 1631. He was nuncio extraordinary to France in 1634, and gained the favour of the French king, who sent him as ambassador to Savoy in 1640. Through the influence of the French court, Mazarin was made a cardinal in 1641. The next year he was admitted into the supreme council. The death of Richelieu (in 1642) and of Louis XIII. (in 1643) opened a wider sphere to the ambition of Mazarin, whom Richelieu recommended as his successor. By the will of the late king he was declared sole adviser of the queen-regent, Anne of Austria, in respect to ecclesiastic affairs, and he soon acquired the principal power in the government, as well as the confidence of that queen. He used his power at first with moderation, and courted popularity by gracious and affable manners. He prosecuted the war against Spain which began under his predecessor, and in which Condé and Turenne maintained the honour of the French arms. A dispute which arose between the court and the Parliament of Paris was fomented by Cardinal de Retz into the revolt of the Parisians called "the Day of the Barricades," (August 27, 1648,) and was followed by the civil war of the Fronde. The queen, with her son, Louis XIV., and Mazarin, were driven out of Paris in 1649 by the Frondeurs. This civil war was more remarkable for the levity of the people than for their military exploits. Ladies directed the several factions, and cabals were made or broken by amorous intrigues. In the midst of these domestic broils, Mazarin had been so fortunate or politic as to conclude with the German emperor the famous treaty of Westphalia, (1648,) by which the latter ceded to France the province of Alsace. In 1651 the cardinal was exiled to Cologne; but about two years later he returned to the capital in triumph, and the end of the rebellion, in 1654, restored him to his former power. He made in 1655 a treaty of alliance with Cromwell, who, being solicited as an ally by the French and the Spanish courts, preferred the former. He acquired the same influence over the king, who had attained his majority, as he had exerted over the queen. It is said that Louis XIV. wished to marry Marie Mancini, a niece of his minister, but the latter discouraged the match, and in 1659 negotiated a marriage with a Spanish princess. Mazarin once said "Louis contained the material for four kings and one honest man." He died at Vincennes in March, 1661. His person was remarkably handsome, and his manners fascinating. "Mazarin," says Mignet, "had a far-seeing and inventive mind, a character rather supple than feeble. His device was 'Le Temps et moi.'" Much diversity of opinion exists respecting his merit as a statesman; but it may safely be affirmed that he was able and skilful, and, though avaricious, he was not a cruel or revengeful minister.

Mazeline, măz'lĕn', (PIERRE,) a French sculptor, born at Rouen in 1633. The palace of Versailles is adorned with several of his works. Died in 1708.

Mą-zep'pą, (IVAN STEPANOVITCH,) a celebrated Polish adventurer, born in the government of Kief in 1644, was educated at the court of John Casimir, King of Poland. Having been detected in an intrigue with the wife of a nobleman, he was bound by his orders to one of the wild horses of the Ukraine and carried to the country of the Cossacks. He was kindly received by them, and rose to be hetman, or commander-in-chief of their armies, about 1687. When Peter the Great attempted to take possession of the Ukraine, Mazeppa strongly opposed the measure, but, finding resistance vain, entered into a negotiation with Charles XII. of Sweden for the independence of his country. The plan being discovered, and Mazeppa deserted by his troops, he joined the Swedish army, and after the battle of Pultava took refuge in Turkey, where he died in 1709. The adventures of Mazeppa have formed the subject of one of Byron's poems.

Mazza, (ANGELO,) an Italian poet, born at Parma in 1741, became professor of Greek in his native city, (1768.) He was the author of an ode entitled "Aura Armonica," and a number of lyrics, which obtained for him a high reputation. Died in 1817.

See TIPALDO, "Biografia degli Italiani illustri."

Mazza, (GIUSEPPE,) an Italian sculptor, born at Bologna in 1652; died in 1741.

Mazzinghi, mât-sĕn'gee? (JOSEPH,) an English musician and composer, born in London in 1768, was patronized by George III. and George IV. Among his most popular operas we may name "The Blind Girl," "The Exile," and "Paul and Virginia." Died at Bath in 1844.

Mazzini, mât-see'nee, (GIUSEPPE,) a distinguished Italian patriot and writer, born at Genoa, June 28, 1808, was educated for the profession of law. In his youth he wrote a number of literary articles for the "Indicatore Genovese" and other journals, and was an adherent of the romantic school. He devoted himself at an early age to the liberation and unity of Italy, which was then degraded and oppressed by Austria and by various petty despots. In 1830 he joined the Society of Carbonari, which he proposed to reform. Having been banished or proscribed, he retired in 1831 to Marseilles, where he organized a political association called "Young Italy," (La Giovine Italia,) whose watchword was "God and the People," and whose fundamental idea was that the liberty of the Italians can only be secured by the union of the several states or kingdoms into one nation. He propagated his principles by writings, and, during a long period of exile and adversity, pursued his purpose with invincible constancy.

About 1842 he became a resident of London, and began to contribute political and scientific articles to various journals, among which was the "Westminster Review." His letters were opened in the post-office in 1844 by the British secretary for the home department, Sir James Graham. The revolutionary movements of 1848 restored him to his native country. He issued a journal called "Italia del Popolo," and, although he preferred a republic, was disposed to co-operate with King Charles Albert in resistance to Austrian domination, and he enlisted under the standard of Garibaldi. In February, 1849, he went to Rome, in which a republic had recently been organized after the flight of the pope. He was quickly recognized as the leader and master-spirit of the republicans, and in March of that year Mazzini, Saffi, and Armellini were appointed triumvirs. They defended Rome resolutely against the French army, by which that city was at length captured in July, 1849. Mazzini then went into exile, and chose London as the base of his operations. He associated himself with Kossuth and Ledru-Rollin to form an international revolutionary committee about 1851.

In 1857 he incited an insurrection in Northern Italy, and went to Genoa to direct it; but the movement failed. He co-operated with Garibaldi in his victorious expedition to Sicily in 1860, and opposed the project which Napoleon III. formed for a confederation of Italian states. In 1861 he republished, with additions, an essay "On the Unity of Italy," in which he says, "I know that the idea of a confederation is both the counsel and design of one whom many Italians still regard as the friend and protector of Italy; but I know, too, that he is treacherous, a foreigner, and a despot. That he should seek to weaken in order to dominate us is easily understood; but the mere fact that the suggestion springs from such a source ought to be one of the most powerful warnings against it."

Some of his predictions have been verified by recent events in Italy, which have tended to raise his reputation for sagacity and practical wisdom. He is the author of a work entitled "The Duties of Man," (1858; English version, 1862,) which enjoys great popularity in Italy, and of many other works. The "Life and Writings of Joseph Mazzini," in English, have appeared in 6 vols., (1864–70.) He died at Pisa, March 10, 1872, and was buried in his native town.

The character of Mazzini is well described by Thomas Carlyle in a letter to the London "Times," June, 1844, reprinted in the "Westminster Review" for September of that year. He says, "I have had the honour to know M. Mazzini for a series of years; and I can, with great freedom, testify to all men that he, if I have ever seen one such, is a man of genius and virtue, a man of sterling veracity, humanity, and nobleness of mind,—one of those rare men, numerable, unfortunately, but as units in this world, who are worthy to be called martyr-souls; who in silence piously in their daily life understand and practise what is meant by that."

Mazzola, mât-so'lâ, (GIROLAMO BEDOLO,) an Italian painter, sometimes called MAZZOLINO, born near Parma in 1503, was the most distinguished pupil of Parmigiano. He excelled as a colorist and in perspective. Among his best productions are a "Madonna with Saint Catherine," and "Miracle of the Multiplication of Loaves." Died about 1590.

Mazzola, Mazzuola, mat-soo-o'lâ, or Mazzuoli, mât-soo-o'lee, (GIROLAMO FRANCESCO MARIA,) an eminent Italian painter, surnamed IL PARMIGIANO, ("the Parmesan,") born at Parma in 1503. He visited Rome in 1523, and was employed by Clement VII. to execute a number of works in that city. His style, formed on that of Correggio and Raphael, is characterized by exceeding grace and delicacy of form and softness of colouring, and it was said by his admirers that "the spirit of Raphael had passed into him." Among his master-pieces are the "Madonna della Rosa," in the gallery of Dresden, an "Annunciation," in the principal church of Viadana, the "Madonna with Saint Margaret, Saint Jerome," etc., in the Museum at Bologna, the "Madonna dello Lungo Collo," at Florence, and the "Vision of Saint Jerome," in the National Gallery, London. Mazzola was the first Italian artist who engraved with aquafortis. Died in 1540.

Mēad, (LARKIN GOLDSMITH,) an American sculptor, was born at Chesterfield, New Hampshire, January 3, 1835, and became a citizen of Vermont. He became in 1852 a pupil of H. K. Brown. Among his works are 'The Recording Angel," (1855,) "Vermont," (1857,) statues of Ethan Allen, (1861, 1874,) "The Returned Soldier," (1866,) and a great part of the Lincoln monument at Springfield, Illinois, besides many statuettes, portrait-busts, etc.

Mēad, (MATTHEW,) an English nonconformist divine, born in Buckinghamshire in 1629. He was the author of "The Young Man's Remembrancer," and "Sermons on Ezekiel's Wheels." Died in 1699.

Mead, (RICHARD,) a celebrated English physician, son of the preceding, was born at Stepney in 1673. He studied at Leyden, and subsequently visited Italy, where he took his medical degree at Padua. He was afterwards elected a Fellow of the Royal Society and of the College of Physicians, and on the accession of George II. (1727) became his physician-in-ordinary. He was the author of a "Mechanical Account of Poisons," (1702,) "A Short Discourse concerning Pestilential Contagion," (1720,) which was translated into French and Latin, "Medicina Sacra," (1749,) or an account of diseases mentioned in the Bible, and other medical works of a high character. Dr. Mead numbered among his friends Pope, Newton, and Boerhaave. Died in 1754.

Meade, meed, (GEORGE G.,) a distinguished American general, was born December 13, 1815, at Cadiz, in Spain, where his father, R. W. Meade, was United States consul. He graduated at West Point in 1835, served in the Mexican war, (1846–47,) and became a captain in 1856. He was appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers in August, 1861, and served in the battle of Gaines's Mill, June 27, 1862. At Malvern Hill he received two wounds, July 1. He commanded a division at Antietam, September 17, 1862. Having been raised to the rank of major-general, he directed a corps at the battle of Fredericksburg, December 13, 1862, and at that of Chancellorsville, May 2–3, 1863. On the 28th of June ensuing, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army of the Potomac. Just before the date last named, General Lee had invaded Pennsylvania with a large army, which the Union army encountered at Gettysburg on the 1st of July. General Meade, whose forces occupied a good position on a range of hills, acted mostly on the defensive at this battle, which lasted three days and contributed largely to the triumph of the Union cause. (See LEE, R. E.) General Meade reported that he took at Gettysburg 13,621 prisoners, some of whom were probably wounded, and he lost 16,643 killed and wounded. He was promoted to be a brigadier-general of the regular army by a commission dated July 3, 1863. About the 18th of July he moved his army across the Potomac into Virginia, where he had several skirmishes with the enemy in October and November, 1863. He was second in command of the army of the Potomac in its operations against Richmond in 1864. "I tried as far as possible," says General Grant, "to leave General Meade in independent command of the army of the Potomac. My instructions for that army were all through him, and were general in their nature, leaving all the details and the execution to him. The campaigns that followed proved him to be the right man in the right place." In August, 1864, he was appointed a major-general of the regular army. The army of which he had the immediate command fought great battles at the Wilderness, Spottsylvania Court-House, and Cold Harbour, and was employed many months in the siege of Petersburg. (See GRANT, U. S.) General Meade was appointed commander of the third military district, comprising Georgia, Florida, and Alabama, in 1867. Died Nov. 6, 1872.

Meade, (RICHARD KIDDER,) an American soldier of the Revolution, born in Nansemond county, Virginia, about 1750, was one of General Washington's aides. Died in 1805.

Meade, (WILLIAM,) D.D., son of the preceding, was born in Clarke county, Virginia, in 1789. He graduated at Princeton College in 1808, and in 1841 succeeded Bishop Moore as Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Virginia. He published several theological works. Died in 1862.

Meadowcourt, mĕd'o-kōrt, (RICHARD,) an English critic, born in Staffordshire in 1697, published Notes on Milton's "Paradise Regained." Died in 1769.

Meadows, mĕd'ōz, (ALFRED,) M.D., an English physician, born at Ipswich, June 2, 1833. He studied at King's College, London, and at Paris, and graduated as M.D. at the University of London in 1858. Among his works are "A Manual of Midwifery."

Meadows, (KENNY,) an English artist, born in 1787. He achieved some celebrity as an illustrator of books. Died August 24, 1874.

Meagher, mā'hẹr or mā'ẹr, (THOMAS FRANCIS,) a general, born at Waterford, Ireland, in 1823. He joined the movement for the independence of Ireland, and was condemned in 1848 to banishment or penal servitude for life. He escaped from Tasmania in 1852, and took refuge in the United States. He raised in 1861 an Irish brigade, which he commanded at Gaines's Mill, June 27, at Antietam, September 17, and at Fredericksburg, December 13, 1862. Died in 1867.

Méan, de, dẹh mà'ôN', (CHARLES,) BARON, a Belgian jurist, born at Liege in 1604; died in 1674.

Mēanṣ, (ALEXANDER,) a Methodist minister, born in North Carolina in 1801. He became professor of natural science in Emory College in 1838, and professor of chemistry in a medical college at Atlanta, Georgia, in 1855. Died June 5, 1883.

Méda, mȧ'dȧ', or Merda, mêr'dȧ', (CHARLES ANDRÉ,) a French general, born in 1775, served in the principal wars of the Revolution, and attained the rank of general of brigade, (1808.) He was mortally wounded at the battle of Moskwa, (1812.)

Mede, meed, (JOSEPH,) an eminent English scholar and divine, born in Essex in 1586. He studied at Christ College, Cambridge, where he afterwards became professor of Greek. His "Clavis Apocalyptica," published in 1627, is esteemed a standard work. Died in 1638.

See "Life of Joseph Mede," prefixed to his works, 1672.

Me-de'a, [Gr. Μήδεια; Fr. MÉDÉE, mȧ'dȧ',] a famous sorceress, daughter of Æetes, King of Colchis. Having assisted Jason to obtain the golden fleece, she became his wife and accompanied him to Greece. Being afterwards deserted by him, she destroyed their two sons. The story of Medea has formed the subject of tragedies by Euripides and Sophocles among the ancients, and Corneille among the moderns. Those written by Sophocles, Æschylus, and Ovid are lost.

Médée. See MEDEA.

Mederer, mā'dẹh-rẹr, (JOHANN NEPOMUK,) a German littérateur, born in 1734, published several works on German history. Died in 1808.

Mĕd'hŭrst, (WALTER HENRY,) an English missionary and Chinese scholar, born in London in 1796. Having spent many years in China, Java, and Malacca, and become thoroughly versed in the languages of those countries, he published a "Chinese-and-English Dictionary," (1842,) "Chinese Dialogues," (1844,) "English-and-Japanese Vocabulary," and other works. Died in 1857.

Medici, (ALESSANDRO DE'.) See LEO XI.

Medici, de', dȧ mĕd'e-chee or mā'de-chee, (ALESSANDRO,) the subverter of the liberties of Florence, born in 1510, is supposed by some to have been a natural son of Lorenzo, Duke of Urbino, and by others, of the cardinal Giulio de' Medici, afterwards Clement VII. After the sacking of Rome, in 1527, the latter made a treaty with the emperor Charles V. in 1529, by which it was agreed that the Medici should be restored to their former rank at Florence, with Alexander as chief of the republic. A marriage was also arranged between him and Margaret of Austria, a natural daughter of the emperor. In 1530 Florence was taken by the Imperial troops under Ferdinand de Gonzaga, and soon after the pope obtained from the emperor a diploma which was to decide the constitution of Florence. By this article Alexander was declared head of the republic, but the Florentines were left in possession of the same privileges they had enjoyed under the former Medici. At length, by the united intrigues of Clement VII. and Alexander, the latter was declared duke of the republic in 1532, and the old form of government was abolished. He now signalized himself by every species of cruelty and oppression. In 1535, Cardinal Ippolito de' Medici, whom he had long feared as a rival, was poisoned by his orders; and he is believed to have caused the death of his own mother in the same manner. In 1537, Lorenzino de' Medici, a distant relative of the duke, desiring to rid his country of such a tyrant, procured his assassination. Alexander left a son, named Giuliano.

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Républiques Italiennes;" MADAME ALLART, "Histoire de la République de Florence."

Medici, de', (COSIMO or COSMO,) surnamed THE ELDER, a celebrated statesman of the Florentine republic, was born in 1389. He was a liberal patron of learning and the arts, and made a munificent use of the immense fortune he had accumulated by commerce, in adorning his native city with public edifices and founding institutions for educational and charitable purposes. Among the most important of these was an academy at Florence for teaching the Platonic philosophy, at the head of which he placed Marsilio Ficino. He also made a large collection of Latin, Greek, and Oriental manuscripts, which he bestowed on the Laurentian Library. These benefits, and the urbanity and moderation of his character, won for him great personal popularity and the title of "Father of his Country." To give a detailed account of his services to literature and art would be to write the history of the Renaissance in the first half of the fifteenth century. In the words of Ginguené, "One saw at Florence Masaccio and Lippi adorn churches and palaces with the productions of their pencil, Donatelli give life and expression to marble, and Brunelleschi, architect, sculptor, and poet, raise the magnificent cupola of Santa Maria del Fiore; while the Greek refugees, in return for the noble asylum he had given them, spread abroad the treasures of their beautiful language and the masterpieces of their orators, philosophers, and poets." Cosimo died in 1464, leaving a son, named Piero.

Medici, de', (COSIMO,) called THE GREAT, [Lat. COS'MUS MEDICE'US MAG'NUS,] son of the general Giovanni de' Medici, was born in 1519. On the death of Alexander he was declared his successor in 1537, through the influence of Cardinal Cibo, which choice was confirmed by Charles V. In 1537 he obtained a victory at Montemerlo over the hostile Florentines. Cruel and suspicious in his disposition, he caused upwards of four hundred Florentine emigrants to be put to death in the early part of his reign, and, having deprived the magistrates of all authority, was invested with absolute power. In 1554 the Marquis de Marignano, one of his generals, defeated the French army under Marshal Strozzi, at Siannagallo, and soon after Philip II., having succeeded the emperor, conferred upon the Duke of Florence the state of Sienna, with the exception of the ports. In 1562 Giovanni de' Medici, a son of Cosimo, died suddenly, as is supposed, by the hand of his brother Don Garcias. A short time after, the latter also died, and his father was charged with his death. Eleonora of Toledo, wife of the grand duke, soon followed her sons, and her death was likewise attributed to Cosimo. These fatal events form the subject of Alfieri's tragedy of "Don Garcias." In 1564 Cosimo made his son Francesco his associate in the government, and in 1569 he was declared Grand Duke of Tuscany by a bull of Pius V. He died in 1574, leaving three legitimate sons, Francesco, Ferdinand, and Piero.

Medici, de', (COSIMO II.,) Grand Duke of Tuscany, born in 1590, was a son of Ferdinand I. He began to reign in 1609, and ruled with moderation and clemency. Died in 1621.

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Républiques Italiennes."

Medici, de', (COSIMO III.,) a son of Ferdinand II., was born in 1642, and became grand duke in 1670. He married Marguerite d'Orléans, (a daughter of Gaston de France,) who regarded Cosimo with extreme dislike and caused him much trouble. He died in 1723, and his family then became extinct.

See BOTTA, "Storia d'Italia."

Medici, de', (FRANCESCO,) Grand Duke of Tuscany, was a son of Cosimo the Great, and was born March 25, 1541. He began to reign on his own account in 1574, and proved a suspicious, false, and despotic tyrant. Love of science, art, and letters was his only virtue. In 1578 he married his mistress, the beautiful Bianca Capello. Died at Poggio a Caiano, October 18, 1587.

Medici, de', (GIOVANNI.) See LEO X.

Medici, de', (GIOVANNI,) an Italian statesman, born in 1360, was the father of Cosimo the Elder, noticed above. He amassed a large fortune by commerce, and rose through various offices to be gonfaloniere of justice in 1421. Died in 1428.

See MACHIAVEL, "Storie Fiorentine."

Medici, de', (GIOVANNI,) an Italian general, of the same family as the preceding, was born in 1498. He distinguished himself both by his courage and his ferocity in the civil wars of his country, and afterwards entered the French service. He was mortally wounded in battle in 1526.

Medici, de', (GIULIANO,) youngest son of Lorenzo the Magnificent, was born in 1478. He married in 1515 Philiberta of Savoy, aunt of Francis I., by whom he was created Duke of Nemours. Died in 1516.

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Républiques Italiennes."

Medici, de', (GIULIO.) See CLEMENT VII.

Medici, de', (IPPOLITO,) an Italian cardinal, born at Urbino in 1511, was a natural son of Giuliano, noticed above. He possessed immense wealth, and was noted for his accomplishments and his profligacy. He died in 1535, from the effects of poison administered, it is supposed, by order of Alessandro de' Medici, Duke of Florence.

See VARCHI, "Istoria Fiorentina."

Medici, de', (LORENZO I.,) surnamed THE MAGNIFICENT, [Fr. LAURENT LE MAGNIFIQUE, lō′rŏN′ lẹh măn′-ye′fēk′; Lat. LAUREN′TIUS MED′ICES or MEDICE′US; It. LORENZO IL MAGNIFICO, lo-rĕn′zo ēl mân-yē′e-ko,] Prince of Florence, was born in 1448. He was the son of Piero I., and grandson of Cosimo the Elder, and, having early entered public life, succeeded to the influence and popularity of his predecessors. He was carefully educated by the best masters of the time, being instructed in the Platonic philosophy by the celebrated Marsilio Ficino. In 1478 he narrowly escaped falling a victim to a conspiracy formed by the Pazzi family of Florence in conjunction with the Archbishop of Pisa and Pope Sixtus IV. His brother Giuliano was assassinated, and he received a slight wound. The Archbishop of Pisa was hanged for this offence, and Lorenzo was excommunicated by Pope Sixtus IV. In 1484 the latter died, and was succeeded by Innocent VIII., who became a friend and ally of Lorenzo. Florence enjoyed great prosperity under the government of Lorenzo, who acquired the favour of the people by his munificence, prudence, and clemency. He was highly distinguished as a patron of literature and art, founded at Florence an academy for the study of the antique, and expended large sums in the erection of public edifices and in the collection of libraries. He also attained considerable eminence as a poet. Died in April, 1492.

Medici, de', (LORENZO II.,) eldest son of Piero II., born at Florence in 1492, was placed, through the influence of his uncle, Leo X., at the head of the republic. He married in 1518 Madeleine de La Tour, daughter of Jean, Count d'Auvergne, and died in 1519, leaving an infant daughter, Catherine de Médicis, afterwards Queen of France.

Medici, de', (LUDOVICO,) Duke of Sarto, called also the CHEVALIER DE MEDICI, a Neapolitan statesman, born in 1760. He was appointed minister of finance in 1810, and in 1815 was sent as ambassador to Vienna. Died in 1830.

Medici, de', (PIERO I.,) eldest son of Cosimo the Elder, born in 1414, succeeded his father as chief of the Florentine republic. He had powerful rivals in the Pitti family and other nobles of Florence, whose attempt to assassinate him was defeated by the prudence of his son Lorenzo. Died in 1469.

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Républiques Italiennes."

Medici, de', (PIERO II.,) eldest son of Lorenzo the Magnificent, was born at Florence in 1471. He succeeded to the rank and influence of his father in the republic; but his arrogance and rashness soon deprived him of the popularity hitherto enjoyed by his family. On the invasion of Italy by Charles VIII., in 1494, Piero made overtures to the French king, into whose hands he surrendered several important places. Having subsequently entered the French army, he shared in its defeat at the Garigliano by Gonsalvo de Córdova in 1503, and was drowned in attempting to cross the river.

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Républiques Italiennes."

Medici, de', (SALVESTRO,) a Florentine statesman, belonged to the Ghibeline faction, and was one of the principal rivals of the Albizzi family. He was made gonfaloniere of justice in 1378; but, the Guelph party having again come into power, he was banished in 1381.

Medina de Medinilla, de, dà mà-dee′nâ dà mà-dẹ-nēl′yâ, (PEDRO,) a Spanish poet, supposed to have been a native of Seville. He wrote an eclogue on the death of Isabella, wife of Lope de Vega, his intimate friend.

Medina-Sidonia, de, dà mà-dee′nâ se-do′ne-â, (ALONZO de Guzman—dà gooth-mân′,) DUKE, a Spanish grandee, who was governor of Milan and Captain-General of Andalusia, and was appointed admiral of the great Armada or fleet sent in 1588 to attack England. Almost entirely ignorant of naval affairs, the duke was ill fitted to contend either with the severe storms of that unfortunate expedition or with the active and hardy English sailors, led by Effingham, Hawkins, Drake, and Frobisher. (See ELIZABETH.) Medina-Sidonia returned to Spain with scarcely a third of his fleet.

Medina-Sidonia, de, dà mà-dee′nâ se-do′ne-â, (GASPAR ALONZO Perez de Guzman—pā′rĕth dà gooth-mân′,) DUKE, a Spanish grandee, who lived about 1640, was a nephew of the prime minister Olivarez. He formed a project to make himself King of Andalusia; but his design was discovered before he began to execute it.

Meding, mā′ding, (OSKAR,) a German novelist, born at Königsberg, April 11, 1829. He was educated at Heidelberg and Berlin, and in 1851 became a lawyer. He was a close personal adherent of the fortunes of the King of Hanover, but in 1870 became a Prussian subject. Most of his numerous novels were published under the name of GREGOR SAMAROW. He wrote "For Sceptre and Crown," (1872,) "Mines and Counter-Mines of Europe," (1873,) "Two Imperial Crowns," (1875,) "Cross and Sword," (1875,) "Heights and Depths," (a social romance, 20 vols., 1879–80,) "Queen Elizabeth," (1881,) etc., besides "Memoirs of Contemporary History," (1881.)

Mehemet-Alee, (or -Ali,) mêh'hẹh-mêt ȧ'lee, or Mo-ham'med-Al'ee, Viceroy of Egypt, was born at Kavala in 1769. Having lost his parents at an early age, he was protected by the Turkish governor of the town. His distinguished abilities and energy soon won for him a high reputation, and he was sent in 1799 to assist the British in expelling the French from Egypt. He was appointed in 1804 Pasha of Cairo, for his services in defending that city from the oppression of the Mamelukes, and in 1806 was made Governor of Upper Egypt by the Sultan. After a protracted contest with the Mamelukes, who had for centuries been the scourge of the country, Mehemet Alee invited them to a festival at Cairo, and, having enclosed them in the citadel, ordered a general massacre, in which four hundred and seventy perished, (1811.) This sanguinary act was followed by the destruction of the Mamelukes in other parts of Egypt. In 1830 he invaded Syria, which he soon subdued, and which, after the interference of the sovereigns of Europe, was ceded to him by the Sultan, on condition of his being a vassal of the Porte, (1833.) The Sultan, becoming jealous of his powerful rival, made a treaty, in conjunction with several European powers, in 1841, by which Mehemet was obliged to relinquish Syria, but his family was permitted to retain the pashalic of Egypt. He died in 1849, having the previous year resigned the government to his son, Ibrâheem Pasha. As a ruler, Mehemet Alee displayed talents of a very high order, and few princes have founded more beneficent institutions or shown a more just and liberal spirit. He established schools and colleges, created an army and navy, and introduced the manufactures of Europe. He protected his Christian subjects, and aided by his liberality the researches of Champollion, Lepsius, and other eminent savants.

Méhul, mȧ'ül', (ÉTIENNE HENRI,) a celebrated French composer, born in the department of Ardennes in 1763.

Having previously received some instruction from Hauser, a German organist, he repaired in 1778 to Paris, where he became a pupil of Gluck. In 1790 he brought out his opera of "Euphrosyne and Coradin," which met with brilliant success and was pronounced by Grétry equal to the finest productions of Gluck. Among his operas, which are more than forty in number, we may name 'Stratonice," "Joseph in Egypt," and "The Blind Man of Toledo." His "Song of Victory" and other popular melodies of the kind are also greatly admired. Méhul was one of the inspectors of the Conservatory of Music, and a member of the French Institute. Died in 1817.

Me-lam'pus, [Gr. Μελάμπους; Fr. MÉLAMPE, mā'lôNp',] a mythical personage of Argos, famous as a soothsayer, was a son of Amythaon. He was considered as the first mortal that possessed prophetic power, and the first that practised medicine.

Me-lăn'ch'thọn [Ger. pron. mā-lânK'ton] or Melan'thon, (PHILIP,) an eminent German Reformer and scholar, whose original name was SCHWARZERD or SCHWARZERDT, (shwârts'êrt: i.e. "Black Earth,") which, according to the usage of the time, he changed into Greek, was born at Bretten, in the Palatinate, February 16, 1497. His father was a skilful and prosperous armourer. He entered in 1507 the Academy of Pforzheim, where he enjoyed the patronage of Reuchlin, who was his great-uncle. About the age of twelve he passed to the University of Heidelberg, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts, and went in 1512 to finish his studies in the University of Tübingen. He learned the Greek language, mathematics, jurisprudence, etc., and remained in this university a number of years, during which he gave public lectures on the classics and other subjects. In 1518 he was appointed professor of Greek in the University of Wittenberg, then recently founded, and there became the colleague and friend of Luther, whose doctrines he adopted. The renown of his learning and eloquence soon attracted multitudes of students from all parts of Germany. In 1519 Luther and Melanchthon held a public disputation at Leipsic with Eckius, one of the ablest champions of the Roman Catholic Church. Melanchthon married in 1520 Katharina Krapp, daughter of a burgomaster of Wittenberg. It appears that he was never ordained as a minister of the gospel. He gave much attention to biblical exegesis, and became a prominent advocate of the Reformed religion by his writings. Compared with the other Reformers, he was distinguished for moderation and gentleness, which tended to restrain the impetuosity of Luther. In 1521 he published an able defence of the Reformed doctrines, in a systematic treatise on theology, entitled "Loci communes Rerum theologicarum," which enjoyed great popularity. It was commended by Luther as being "next to the Holy Scriptures the most excellent work on theology." He aided Luther in his German translation of the Bible, on which he expended much time, (1522–34.) In 1529 he attended the Diet of Spire. Having been appointed by the leading Reformers to compose a formal exposition of the Lutheran faith, he wrote the celebrated "Augsburg Confession," which was presented to the emperor Charles V. at the Diet of Augsburg in 1530, and is perhaps the most important symbolical book of the Lutheran Church. A Latin version of this Confession was published under the title of "Confessio Fidei exhibita invictissimo Imperatori Carolo V.," etc., (1531.) He also wrote, in reply to certain Catholic theologians, an "Apology of the Confession," ("Apologie der Augsburgischen Confession.") He was invited by Henry VIII. of England and Francis I. of France to visit their courts; but he declined both invitations, and remained at Wittenberg. He was one of the theologians that disputed with the Roman Catholics at the Conference of Worms (1540) and the Conference of Ratisbon, (1541,) where he proposed concessions and compromises which the other Reformers rejected. After the death of Luther, in 1546, Melanchthon was recognized as the leader of the Reformation in Germany. His conduct was conformed to the maxim "In necessariis unitas, in dubiis libertas, in omnibus caritas," ("In essentials unity, in doubtful points liberty, in all things charity,") which subjected him to violent denunciations from some Protestant zealots. In 1551 he was sent as a delegate to the Council of Trent, which, however, was dispersed by the hostile movements of Maurice of Saxony before Melanchthon arrived at Trent. The latter years of his life were greatly troubled by the acrimonious dissensions among the Protestant theologians. He died at Wittenberg on the 19th of April, 1560, leaving three surviving children. He was a man of small stature. Among his numerous works were "Elements of Logic and Ethics," a Greek Grammar, Commentaries on the Scriptures, editions of several classic authors, with notes, and an extensive correspondence with his eminent contemporaries. An edition of his works was published at Wittenberg by his son-in-law, Peucer, in 1562–64.

Melendez-Valdez, mȧ-lẽn'dêth vȧl'dêth, or Valdes, vȧl'dês, (JUAN ANTONIO,) an eminent Spanish poet, born in Estremadura in 1754. He studied law at Salamanca, where he became intimate with the poet Cadalso, and distinguished himself by his attainments in English literature, of which he was a warm admirer. His idyl "Batilo" (1780) won the prize at the Spanish Academy, and another was given to his "Pindaric Ode on the Fine Arts" by the Academy of San Fernando. He published in 1785 a collection of lyric and pastoral poems, which established his reputation as the first Spanish poet of his time. He had been appointed in 1781, through the influence of his friend Jovellanos, professor of humanities at Salamanca. In 1791 he obtained an important office in the chancery of Valladolid, and in 1798 became fiscal of the supreme court of Madrid. He published in 1797 another collection of poems, dedicated to Godoy, who soon after appointed him to a high office at court. On the fall of the minister Jovellanos, Melendez was exiled from Madrid, to which he was not permitted to return until the fall of Godoy, (1808.) Having subsequently joined the French party in Spain, he was created councillor of state and minister of public instruction by Joseph Bonaparte. He died in France in 1817. Of Melendez, Ticknor observes, "There can be no doubt that he was better fitted to form a new school, and give a guiding impulse to the national poetry, than any writer that had appeared in Spain for above a century."

Memminger, mĕm'min-jĕr, ? (CHARLES GUSTAVUS,) a native of Würtemberg, Germany, born in 1803, settled at Charleston, South Carolina, where he became distinguished as a lawyer and politician. He zealously opposed the State Rights party, which he satirized in his "Book of Nullification," (1832.) He was appointed secretary of the treasury in the cabinet of Jefferson Davis in February, 1861, and resigned in June, 1864. Died March 7, 1888.

Mem'mĭ-us, (CAIUS,) a Roman tribune, was a strenuous opponent of the aristocrats. He became tribune of the people in 111 B.C., and exposed the venality and corruption of the aristocratic leaders in their management of the Jugurthine war. While a candidate for the consulship, he was killed by the mob led by Saturninus in 100 B.C.

Memmius, (CAIUS GEMELLUS,) a Roman orator, poet, and politician, was a tribune of the people in 66 B.C., and prætor in 58. He was a son-in-law of Sulla, and friend of Lucretius, who dedicated to him his poem "De Rerum Naturâ." He is also frequently mentioned by Cicero. Having been accused of bribery, (ambitus,) he went into exile about 54 B.C.

Mem'non, [Gr. Μέμνων,] a mythical personage, supposed to have been a son of Tithonus and Eos, (Aurora,) and a king of Ethiopia or Egypt. According to tradition, he fought for the Trojans at the siege of Troy, slew Antilochus, and was killed by Achilles. The poets feigned that the dew-drops which appear in the morning are the tears which Aurora shed for the death of Memnon. Many writers identify Memnon with Amenophis II. of Egypt, in whose honour was erected the celebrated colossal statue near Thebes. This statue, which is still extant and is about fifty feet high, was commonly believed by the ancients to emit a sound when it was first touched by the beams of the morning sun. Some writers, including Sir Gardner Wilkinson, believe that the phenomenon was the result of imposture.

See SIR J. GARDNER WILKINSON, "Topography of Thebes," pp. 33–37.

Mem'non, a Greek general in the service of Darius, King of Persia, attained the rank of high admiral, and Governor of Western Asia. He had great military talents. Died in 333 B.C.

Ménage, mà'nâzh', (GILLES,) a celebrated French critic and scholar, born at Angers in 1613. He studied law, and practised for a time in Paris, where he became an advocate to the Parliament. He subsequently devoted himself entirely to literary pursuits, and his house became the resort of the distinguished wits and writers of the time, including Balzac, Sarrazin, and Madame Rambouillet. He was patronized by Paul de Gondi, afterwards Cardinal de Retz, whose favour he subsequently lost, owing to his arrogance and strong propensity for satire. He was also involved in a literary feud with Boileau, who has severely satirized him in one of his poems, and with Molière, who introduced him into his "Femmes savantes," in the character of Vadius. His reputation rests principally on his "Etymological Dictionary of the French Language," (1650,) which is still a useful work. He also published poems in Latin, French, and Italian, and his friends made a collection of his witticisms, etc., entitled "Ménagiana," (1693,) which ranks among the best productions of the kind. His "Request of the Dictionaries," a satire on the Dictionary of the French Academy, is believed to have been the cause of his exclusion from that institution. Died in Paris, July 23, 1692.

Me-nan'dẹr, [Gr. Μένανδρος; Fr. MÉNANDRE, mȧ'nôNdr'; Ger. MENANDROS, mȧ-nȧn'dROS,] a Greek dramatic poet, born at Athens in 341 B.C., is called the originator of the new comedy, giving representations of actual life and manners. He enjoyed the highest reputation among his contemporaries, and is eulogized by Julius Cæsar, Plutarch, and other eminent men of antiquity. His dramas were very numerous, but they have been lost, with the exception of the fragments preserved in the works of several Greek writers.

Mencius, mẽn'she-us, the Latinized form of Meng-Tse, mẽng'tsẹh', or Meng-Tseu, mẽng'tsUh', (named also Meng-Kho, in his youth,) was, after Confucius, the most celebrated of all the Chinese philosophers. He was born in the little state of Tsow, (or Tsou,) which was subsequently included in the kingdom of Loo, and in the modern province of Shan-Toong, (or Shan-Tung,) about 370 years before Christ: he was, therefore, a contemporary of Plato and Aristotle. He lost his father in his early childhood. To his mother, who appears to have been a woman of rare intelligence and worth, he was indebted, in a great measure, not merely for his inclination towards learning and philosophy, but also for that pure and lofty virtue for which he was so distinguished. It is related that after the death of her husband she resided for a short time near a butcher's shop, but, fearing that the frequent sight of scenes of blood might harden and deprave the heart of her son, she removed to another abode. This happened to be near a cemetery, and young Mencius amused himself with acting the various scenes which he witnessed at the tombs. "This," said his mother to herself, "is no place for my son." She again changed her dwelling, and took a house in the marketplace. But here he soon began to play the part of a salesman, vaunting his wares and chaffering with customers. The watchful and anxious mother was not yet satisfied. At last she found a house close by a school. Her son's attention was attracted by the various studies and exercises which he saw pursued in the school, and a desire for learning was awakened in his mind. Soon after she sent him to the school; and he is said to have distinguished himself by the quickness of his intellect, and subsequently by his earnest application to study. The following story may serve to show his mother's conscientious watchfulness in regard to the moral education of her son. Seeing a butcher killing pigs, he asked her what that was done for. She replied rather thoughtlessly, (as it appears,) "It is to furnish you with food." Her conscience at once reproved her for saying what was not strictly true, and, anxious not to set him an example of untruthfulness, she went and bought some pork in order to make good her words. One day when he returned home from school, she looked up from the web which she happened to be weaving, and asked him how he was getting on. He answered, carelessly, that he was doing well enough, whereupon she took a knife and cut through her web. Alarmed, he inquired what she meant. She then showed him that she had only done what he was doing: she had lost her labour and thrown away the time she had spent in weaving the web, he also was throwing away his precious time through neglect of his studies. The lesson was not lost upon him, and did not need to be repeated.

Some writers represent Mencius as having studied under Tseu-sse, (or Tsze-sze,) the grandson of Confucius. But this is scarcely possible, since Tseu-sse, had he been living, would have been more than a hundred years old when Mencius was born. It is, however, certain that he diligently studied the writings of Confucius, to the neglect of whose precepts he attributed the miserable state of things which he saw everywhere around him, faith and justice being disregarded, the bonds of society breaking asunder, and the whole empire hastening to decay. He resolved to devote his life to correcting these evils and restoring, so far as it lay in his power, the virtues of the primitive ages.

Although Mencius considered himself a follower of Confucius, yet in his mode of instruction, and especially in his behaviour towards those rulers who sought his counsel, he differed materially from his master. In his reasoning, if less grave than Confucius, he displayed more art and more acuteness. His method, indeed, was not unlike the dialectic of Socrates; he pushed his adversary from one admission to another, until he obliged him either to confess his defeat or else to maintain the most obvious and palpable absurdities. In his intercourse with kings he was more bold and severe than Confucius, both in exposing folly and denouncing injustice and oppression. Mencius appears to have been held in great respect by most of the Chinese princes to whom his fame had penetrated. It is not known at what time in his life he first began to teach publicly; but we are told that when he felt that he was sufficiently conversant with the doctrines and precepts of the great teachers of Chinese philosophy, he commenced his travels for the purpose of offering his counsels to the different petty sovereigns who ruled in the states adjacent or neighbouring to Loo. But, although he seems to have enjoyed more consideration than Confucius had done, he was scarcely more successful in carrying into practice his ideal plans of government. His theory of morals was too high and difficult for human nature in its ordinary condition. He appears not to have succeeded in a single instance in prevailing on any of the princes to embrace and consistently carry out his principles; and accordingly he had little inducement to continue at any of the courts longer than was necessary in order to make a fair trial of what his influence could effect. He is said to have passed the last twenty years of his life in the more congenial society of his disciples, and in writing those works by which he has perhaps exerted a greater influence on after-ages than he did upon that in which he lived. He is supposed to have died at an advanced age about 290

B.C. According to Dr. Legge, he died 288 B.C.; some other authorities, however, place the date of his death many years earlier. The descendants of Mencius, like those of Confucius, constitute at the present day a class of what may be termed hereditary nobles,—the only hereditary nobility in China.

One of the chief doctrines of Mencius was that man is naturally good, although he admitted that by far the greater part of mankind had, through unfavourable circumstances or influences, become perverted. He says the way in which a man loses his natural goodness is like the way in which trees are deprived by the woodman of their branches and foliage. And if they still send forth some buds and sprouts, then come the cattle and goats and browse upon them. As in the tree all appearance of life and beauty is destroyed, so in man, after a long exposure to evil influences, all traces of native goodness seem to be obliterated. But he maintains that there is an original power of goodness in the race, and that all men may, if they will, become like Yao and Shun, two of the early sages and kings, who were pre-eminent for their virtue. A distinguished Chinese scholar says the great object of Mencius, in his writings, is to rectify men's hearts. "If a man once rectify his heart," says Mencius, "little else will remain for him to do." In another place he says, "The great or superior man is he who does not lose his child's heart," an expression which vividly recalls those beautiful lines of the great German poet,—

"Wohl dem der frei von Schuld und Fehle Bewahrt die kindlich reine Seele."*

It is evident, however, that, owing to his sanguine and ardent nature, or to some other cause, Mencius did not very fully realize the exceeding difficulty of "rectifying one's heart." Yet Confucius, who was regarded by Mencius as the most perfect of human beings, recognized this great but melancholy truth, when he said it was only at the age of seventy that "he could follow what his heart desired without transgressing what was right." ("Analects," book ii.)

Confucius had always inculcated the reciprocal obligation between kings and subjects. Mencius, without denying the general obligation of obedience on the part of subjects, taught nevertheless that among the various elements in a state "the people are the most important element, and the sovereign the least important;" and he did not hesitate to draw the legitimate inference from such a position that a bad sovereign ought to be dethroned, and even slain, if his life should endanger or in any way interfere with the public good.

The distinguished Orientalist Rémusat, in drawing a comparison between Confucius and Mencius, says the former "is always grave, and even austere; he exalts men of virtue of whom he presents an ideal portrait; he speaks of bad men only with a cool indignation. Mencius, with the same love of virtue, seems to feel for vice rather contempt than abhorrence. He assails it with the force of argument; he does not disdain to even employ against it the weapons of ridicule." Mencius combined a certain modesty with a just and manly appreciation of himself. He seemed greatly surprised when one of his disciples was disposed to rank him as a sage; yet he said on another occasion, "When sages shall rise up again, they will not change my words." He believed that he was appointed by Heaven to uphold or restore the doctrines of the ancient sages, such as Yao, Shun, and Confucius. Han-Yu, a celebrated Chinese critic, says, "If we wish to study the doctrines of the sages, we must begin with Mencius. . . . It is owing to his words that learners nowadays still know to revere Confucius, to honour benevolence and righteousness, to esteem the true sovereign, and to despise the mere pretender." We have already noticed some of the leading opinions of Mencius. The following are a few of his most characteristic sayings: "I love life; I also love righteousness. If I cannot keep both, I will let life go, and choose righteousness." (The Works of Mencius, book vi. chap. x.) "There is a nobility of Heaven, and there is a nobility of man. Benevolence, righteousness, self-consecration, and fidelity, with unwearied joy in these virtues,—these constitute the nobility of Heaven." (Book vi. chap. xvi.) "Benevolence subdues its opposite, just as water subdues fire. This, however, who practise benevolence nowadays do it as if with one cup of water they could save a whole wagon-load of fuel on fire, and, when the flames are not extinguished, should say that water cannot subdue fire. This conduct, moreover, greatly encourages those who are not benevolent." (Book vi. chap. xviii.) "There is no greater delight than to be conscious of sincerity on self-examination." (Book vii. chap. iv.) Kung-Sun-Chow said to Mencius that his principles were admirable, but they were too difficult and lofty for ordinary minds, and asked him why he did not adapt his teachings to the capacity of the learners. He replied, "A great artificer does not, for the sake of a stupid workman, alter or do away with the marking-line." (Book vii. chap. xli.)

Mencke, mĕnk'kẹh, (FRIEDRICH OTTO,) a German scholar and writer, son of Johann Burkhard, noticed below, was born at Leipsic in 1708. He became professor of history at Leipsic in 1732. Among his works is a "Life of Angelo Poliziano," (in Latin, 1736.) Died in 1754.

Mencke, (JOHANN BURKHARD,) born at Leipsic in 1675, became in 1708 historiographer to Frederick Augustus, King of Poland. He published, in Latin, "Two Orations on the Charlatanry of the Learned," (1715,) and a work entitled "Writers of German History," (3 vols., 1728–30.) The former caused a great sensation, and was translated into several foreign languages. Mencke also wrote a number of poems, and, after the death of his father, conducted the "Acta Eruditorum." Died in 1732.

Mendelssohn, mĕn'dẹls-sōn', (MOSES,) an eminent philosopher, born at Dessau, in Germany, in 1729, was the son of a Jewish schoolmaster. In consequence of the limited means of his family, he owed his early education chiefly to his own exertions. In 1745 he repaired to Berlin, where he applied himself to the study of mathematics and the philosophy of Wolf and Leibnitz. In 1754 he formed an intimate friendship with Lessing, in conjunction with whom he afterwards wrote the treatise entitled "Pope a Metaphysician." He next published his "Letters on the Sensations," and in 1767 his "Phædo, a Dialogue on the Immortality of the Soul." The latter work was received with great favour, and was translated into the principal languages of Europe. Mendelssohn was one of the most profound thinkers of his time, and was highly esteemed by his contemporaries for the excellence of his character, as well as his intellectual endowments. Died in 1786.

Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, mĕn'dĕls-sōn' bar-tol'-dee, (FELIX,) an eminent German composer, born at Hamburg in 1809, was a grandson of the preceding. At an early age he manifested extraordinary musical talent, which received the most elaborate culture under Zelter and Ludwig Berger. He performed with brilliant success in Berlin and Paris before he had completed his tenth year, and in 1827 he brought out at Berlin his "Overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream" and his opera of "The Wedding of Camacho." He subsequently visited London and Paris, where the "Overture" above named was received with enthusiasm. After his return to Germany, he was appointed, in 1835, director of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipsic. In 1836 he brought out his oratorio of "Saint Paul," at Dusseldorf and Leipsic, and the following year at Birmingham, England. His "Elijah," an oratorio, performed at the Birmingham Festival in 1846, caused a greater sensation in the musical world than had been known in England since the days of Handel. Subsequently, Mendelssohn's health, which had been some time declining, failed rapidly, and he died soon after his return to Germany, in November, 1847. Among the more important of his other compositions, we may name the overtures of "Fingal's Cave," "A Calm Sea and Happy Voyage," ("Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt,") and "The Beautiful Melusina," ("Die schöne Melusine,") besides a great number of cantatas and instrumental pieces. His "Songs without Words" are particularly admired. As a musician and composer, he is esteemed second only to Handel and Mozart.

Mendès, mŏn'dà', (CATULLE,) a French poet, born at Bordeaux in 1840. His lyrical drama "Le Roman d'une Nuit" (1860) caused his imprisonment. Among his best works are "Hesperus," (1869, a fine poem with a Swedenborgian tone,) and "Le Soleil de Minuit," a dramatic poem. His wife, JUDITH GAUTIER, (q. v.,) was married in 1866, but soon separated from him. Mendès is the author of several tales and romances.

Mendes Leal, mĕn'dĕs là-âl', (JOSÉ da Silva,) a Portuguese poet, born in Lisbon, October 22, 1820. He held positions in the public service, and in 1874 was sent to France as minister plenipotentiary. His very popular "Poems" (1858) were followed by many plays and some romances. Died in 1886.

Mendizabal, y, e mĕn-de-thâ-bâl', (Don JUAN ALVAREZ,) a Spanish statesman, of Jewish extraction, born at Cadiz about 1790. Having amassed a large fortune by trade, he rose to be minister of finance in 1835. Died in 1853.

Mendoça or Mendoza, de, dà mĕn-do'sâ, (ANDREA HURTADO,) a Portuguese naval commander, who rendered great services to his country by clearing the South Seas of pirates and thus protecting the Portuguese establishments in the East Indies. Died about 1606.

Mendoza, de, dà mĕn-do'thâ, (ANTONIO HURTADO,) a Spanish writer, born about 1590, was appointed private secretary to Philip IV. He wrote a number of popular dramas, also lyric poems and prose works. Died in 1644.

See TICKNOR, "History of Spanish Literature."

Mendoza, de, (ANTONIO SARMIENTO,) a Spanish writer, a native of Burgos, lived about 1630. He translated Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered" into Spanish.

Mendoza, de, (Don BERNARDINO,) a Spanish historian and diplomatist, was employed by Philip II. in several missions to France and England. He had a prominent share, while in France, in the formation of the Catholic League. He was the author of a "History of the Netherlands from 1567 to 1577," and a treatise "On the Theory and Practice of War."

See MOTLEY, "History of the United Netherlands," vol. i. chap. iii.; CAPEFIGUE, "Histoire de la Réforme et la Ligue."

Mendoza, de, (DIEGO HURTADO,) a celebrated Spanish writer, soldier, and diplomatist, born at Granada in 1503, was a grandson of the Marquis de Santillana, noticed below. He studied at Salamanca, and distinguished himself by his attainments in the classics, theology, and civil and canon law. He was afterwards patronized by Charles V., who sent him in 1538 on an embassy to Venice. While in this post, he devoted himself to the collection of Greek and Latin manuscripts, of which he acquired a great number, comprising works of Saint Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, and Archimedes. They were subsequently ceded to the Library of the Escurial. He was soon after appointed by the emperor ambassador at Rome and governor of Sienna. Having returned to Spain in 1554, he incurred the displeasure of Philip II., who banished him from court. He devoted himself thenceforth to literary pursuits, and published in 1610 his "History of the Wars against the Moors," ("Guerra de Granada contra los Moriscos.") This work, which has taken its place among Spanish classics, is characterized by great accuracy and impartiality, and is esteemed the best imitation of the Latin historians in modern literature. He was also the author of a number of poems, and the celebrated comic romance of "Lazarillo de Tormes," (1554,) in which he originated the so-called Picaresque school of fiction, afterwards followed by Le Sage in his "Gil Blas." "Mendoza," says Prescott, "by the brilliant success which he achieved as a statesman, a diplomatist, a novelist, a poet, and a historian, has established a reputation for versatility of genius second to none in the literature of Spain." Died in 1575.

Mendoza, de, (JUAN GONZALEZ,) a Spanish missionary, born at Toledo about 1540. He visited China in 1580, and subsequently South America and Mexico. He died as Bishop of Popayan in New Granada, (1617.) He was the author of a "History of the Great Kingdom of China," (1586,) which enjoys a high reputation and has been translated into French.

Mendoza, de, (Don PEDRO,) a wealthy Spaniard, born at Cadiz about 1487. He offered his services, in 1529, to the emperor Charles V., to complete, at his own expense, the exploration of the rivers La Plata and Paraguay. Having been created by the emperor military chief of the country adjacent to those rivers, he set sail in 1534, and founded the city of Buenos Ayres in 1535. He died soon after, while at sea on his return to Spain.

Mendoza, de, (PEDRO GONZALEZ,) a Spanish prelate and statesman, called THE GRAND CARDINAL, born in 1428. He enjoyed the favour of John II. and Henry IV., and was created successively Bishop of Siguenza, Chancellor of Castile and Leon, and cardinal, (1473.) Under Ferdinand and Isabella he became Archbishop of Toledo. He also distinguished himself in the Moorish war, in which he held a command. He founded the Ménélas. See MENELAUS.

Men-e-lā'us, [Gr. Μενέλαος, Μενέλεως, or Μενέλας; Fr. MÉNÉLAS, mȧ'nȧ'lȧs',] a Grecian hero and king of Sparta, was a son of Atreus. He and his brother Agamemnon were called Atridæ. He married the beautiful Helen, who preferred him to all of her numerous suitors, but afterwards eloped with Paris. At the siege of Troy, which was the consequence of the abduction of Helen, Menelaus behaved with great spirit and courage, and fought a single combat with Paris, whom he was about to vanquish, when Venus interposed and rescued him. He was one of the daring band that entered Troy in the wooden horse. On the capture of Troy he recovered Helen, was reconciled to her, and, after a devious voyage of several years, returned to Sparta. A temple was erected in his honour at Therapne.

Menelaus, a celebrated mathematician and astronomer of Alexandria, resided in Rome under the reign of Trajan. His only extant work is a treatise on spherical geometry, which was translated into Latin.

Me-ne'nĭ-us A-grip'pa, surnamed LANA'TUS, a Roman patrician and senator, was chosen consul in 503 B.C. He obtained a signal victory over the Sabines, for which a triumph was decreed him. Through his mediation the contest between the patricians and the plebeians was appeased in 493. On this occasion he related the fable of the belly and the members to the plebeians.

Me-nep'thah II., a king of Egypt, of the nineteenth dynasty, was the son and successor of Rameses II. He gained a great victory over the Greeks and Libyans, probably in what is now called Barca, and reigned thirty years with great dignity. His son, Menepthah III., is said to have been at first a viceroy of Ethiopia under the usurping Sipthah, or pseudo-Menepthah, whom he deposed. After this he reigned for many years at Thebes. He was the last king of his dynasty.

Me'nēs [Gr. Μήνης, or Μῆνις] was the first king of Egypt, according to the traditions of that country. He is said to have founded Memphis, and to have introduced the worship of the gods. He lived probably 2000 B.C., or earlier.

Meneses or Menezes, mȧ-nā'sês, (ALEIXO,) a Portuguese prelate, born at Lisbon in 1559, became Archbishop of Goa, and in 1607 succeeded Alphonso de Castro as Viceroy of the Indies. He was appointed by Philip III. of Spain Viceroy of Portugal in 1614. Died in 1617.

Mengs, mẽngs, (ANTON RAFAEL,) a celebrated German painter, born at Aussig, in Bohemia, in 1728. He was instructed by his father, with whom he resided several years at Rome. On his return to Germany he was appointed court painter at Dresden, in 1744. While on a second visit to Rome, he painted a "Holy Family," which won for him a high reputation. The Madonna in this picture was the portrait of a beautiful peasant-girl, whom Mengs afterwards married, having become a Catholic for her sake. He became in 1754 director of the Academy of Painting at Rome, and in 1757 he executed his celebrated fresco of "Apollo and the Muses" in the villa of Cardinal Albani. On the invitation of Charles III. of Spain, he repaired to Madrid, where he was appointed first painter to the king, with a large salary. Here he produced several of his master-pieces, among which we may name his "Temple of Glory" and "Triumph of Trajan" in the royal palace. He died at Rome in 1779. Mengs is ranked among the best painters of his time, his works being distinguished by great accuracy of design and neatness of execution, but they are censured by critics as deficient in warmth and animation.

See GUIBAL, "Éloge historique de Mengs," 1781; J. J. MARIETTE, "Abecedario;" BIANCONI, "Elogio storico di R. Mengs," 1780; NAGLER, "Allgemeines Künstler-Lexikon."

Mer'cu-rў, [Lat. MERCU'RIUS; Fr. MERCURE, mĕR'kür'; It. MERCURIO, mĕR-koo're-o; Ger. MERCUR, mĕR-koor',] in the Roman mythology, a god of commerce and gain, (from the Latin merx, plural merces, "merchandise,") was regarded as the messenger of the gods, the patron of orators, merchants, travellers, and thieves. He was identified by the Romans of the later ages with the Greek Hermes, and was said to be a son of Jupiter and Maia. The poets feigned that it was his office to conduct the souls of the dead to the infernal regions,—that he stole from Neptune his trident, from Venus her girdle, from Mars his sword, and from Jupiter his sceptre,—that he could assume whatever shape he pleased, and render himself invisible. Having invented the lyre and given it to Apollo, he received from that god a golden wand, called caduceus. The invention of the alphabet, of numbers, of astronomy, of music, and other things, was ascribed to Mercury, who was also interested in alliances and treaties. He was represented with a winged cap (petasus) and winged sandals, (talaria.) He received numerous surnames, among which are Cyllenius, (from Mount Cyllene, where he was born,) Caduceator, (i.e. the "herald" or "wand-bearer,") Argeiphontes, (the "slayer of Argus,") and many other names.

Mes'sẹr, (ASA,) D.D., LL.D., an American divine and scholar, born at Methuen, Massachusetts, in 1769. He graduated at Brown University, where he became successively professor of the learned languages, (1796,) of mathematics and natural philosophy, (1799,) and president of the institution, (1802.) Died in 1836.

Messier, mĕ'se-ā', (CHARLES,) a French astronomer, born at Badonviller, in Lorraine, in 1730. Having visited Paris in 1751, he was employed by De Lisle in his observatory, and distinguished himself by the accuracy of his astronomical observations. He is said to have observed forty-six comets, of which he discovered twenty-one. He was a member of the Academy of Sciences of Paris, and of similar institutions at St. Petersburg, Berlin, and other cities. He died in 1817, leaving "Mémoires" containing his observations. Lalande named in honour of this astronomer a constellation situated between Cepheus, Cassiopeia, and the Camelopard.

Mészáros, mā'sā-rosh, (LAZAR,) a Hungarian general and statesman, born in the county of Bács in 1796. In 1848 he was appointed minister of war in the Hungarian cabinet of Batthyányi, but on the breaking out of the war joined the revolutionary party. After sharing with Dembinski the defeat of Temesvar, he took refuge in Turkey, and afterwards visited England and America. Died in 1858.

Métastase. See METASTASIO.

Metastasio, mā-tâs-tā'ze-o, [Fr. MÉTASTASE, mā'tâs'-tāz',] (PIETRO BONAVENTURA,) an eminent Italian poet, born at Rome in 1698, was originally named TRAPASSI. He manifested at an early age extraordinary talents for improvisation on any subject. Having attracted the notice of the celebrated jurist Gravina, he was adopted by him, and his name was changed to Metastasio, (a "changing,") in allusion to his adoption. His benefactor died in 1718, leaving his property to Metastasio, who now devoted himself principally to literary pursuits, and brought out in 1721 his lyric drama entitled "The Gardens of the Hesperides," ("Gli Orti Esperidi.") This piece was received with great favour, one of the principal parts in it being performed by Signora Bulgarini, (La Romanina,) esteemed the first vocalist of her time. At the request of this lady, he relinquished the legal profession, which he had practised for a time, and gave his attention exclusively to poetry. His opera of "Didone Abbandonata" was performed with great applause at Naples in 1724, and was followed by his "Catone," "Semiramide," "Artaserse," and other operas, which established his reputation. On the invitation of the emperor Charles VI., he repaired to Vienna, and succeeded Apostolo Zeno as imperial laureate. In 1734 he lost his "inestimable counsellor and friend," Signora Bulgarini, who bequeathed to him, after the death of her husband, her property, amounting to twenty-five thousand crowns. This, with characteristic delicacy, he refused to accept. He brought out during his residence at Vienna two of his most admired operas, the "Olimpiade" and "La Clemenza di Tito," which the music of Mozart has contributed to render immortal. Besides the works above named, he composed a number of oratorios, cantatas, sonnets, etc. He died at Vienna in 1782. The genius of Metastasio is eulogized by Voltaire and La Harpe, the former of whom compares some of his scenes to the most sublime of the Greek poets. Rousseau, in his "Nouvelle Héloïse," pronounces him "the only poet of the heart, the only genius who can move by the charm of poetic and musical harmony;" and Schlegel observes that his purity of diction, grace, and delicacy have rendered him in the eyes of his countrymen a classic author,—the Racine of Italy.

Metcalfe, (FREDERICK,) an English author, born in 1817. He graduated as B.A. at Saint John's College, Cambridge, and then went to Oxford, where he became a Fellow of Lincoln College. He was afterwards a clergyman of the Establishment, and in 1848 was made head master of Brighton College. He edited and adapted Becker's "Gallus" (1844; revised edition, 1884) and "Charicles," (1845, 1884,) and wrote a "History of German Literature," and accounts of his travels in Norway, Thelemarken, and Iceland, ("The Oxonian in Norway," etc., 1856, 1858, 1861.) Died in 1885.

Met'calfe, (THOMAS,) an American Whig statesman, born in Fauquier county, Virginia, in 1780, removed at an early age to Kentucky. He worked at the trade of stone-mason in his youth. He became Governor of Kentucky in 1828, and filled that office four years. In 1848 he succeeded Mr. Crittenden in the United States Senate. His term expired in March, 1849. Died in 1855.

Metelli. See MITELLI.

Me-tel'lus, (QUINTUS CÆCILIUS,) called MACEDO'NICUS, an eminent Roman general, of a noble family, was chosen prætor in 148 B.C. He gained a victory over the Macedonians in that year, and took their leader, Andriscus, prisoner, for which a triumph was decreed him. In 146 he defeated the Achæans near Thermopylæ. He was made consul in 143, and was sent to Spain to oppose Viriathus. It was during the censorship of Metellus and Pompeius (131 B.C.) that the decree was passed obliging all Roman citizens to marry. He opposed the Gracchi. Died in 115 B.C.

See TACITUS, "Annales;" LIVY, "Epitome."

Metellus, (QUINTUS CÆCILIUS NUMIDICUS,) an able Roman general, a nephew of the preceding, was a leader of the aristocratic party. Having been chosen consul for 109 B.C., he obtained as his province Numidia, then the seat of war with Jugurtha, who had hitherto succeeded in outgeneralling or outwitting all the Roman commanders sent against him. Metellus was more successful, and finally gained a great victory over the African prince at the river Muthul, towards the close of that year. Before the end of this war the command was transferred to Marius; but Metellus was honoured with a triumph on his return to Rome in 107, and received the surname of NUMID'ICUS. He became censor in 102, and was banished about 100 B.C., through the influence of Marius and Saturninus, but he was recalled the next year. He was distinguished as an orator, and was reputed one of the most virtuous men of his time.

See SALLUST, "Bellum Jugurthinum;" PLUTARCH, "Marius."

Metellus, (QUINTUS CÆCILIUS PIUS,) a Roman general, a son of the preceding, became prætor in 89 B.C. In the civil war between Marius and Sulla he fought for the latter, and gained a decisive victory over Carbo and Norbanus, near Faventia, in 82 B.C. He was chosen consul with Sulla in the year 80, after which he commanded in Spain and spent several years in unsuccessful efforts to conquer Sertorius. He became pontifex maximus. Died about 63 B.C.

Me-tel'lus Ce'ler, (Q. CÆCILIUS,) a Roman statesman, and leader of the aristocratic party. He became prætor in 63 B.C., acted with Cicero against Catiline, and was chosen consul for the year 60. During his consulship he resolutely opposed the laws which his colleague Afranius desired to enact for the benefit of Pompey. Died in 59 B.C.

Me-tel'lus Ne'pos, (QUINTUS,) a brother of the preceding, became tribune of the people in 63 B.C., and was a partisan of Pompey. As tribune, he opposed Cicero with some violence. He became prætor in 60, and consul in 57 B.C. Died about 55 B.C.

Meteren, van, vän mā'tẹh-rẹn, (EMANUEL,) a Flemish Protestant historian, born at Antwerp in 1535, was the author of a "History of the Netherlands from the Early Part of the Sixteenth Century to his Own Time," (in Latin and Flemish.) It is valued for its accuracy; but the historian is accused by some writers of injustice towards the Catholics. Died in 1612.

See S. RUYTINCK, "Biographie de Van Meteren," prefixed to his "Histoire," (French translation.)

Meteyard, mēt'yärd, (ELIZA,) an English writer, born in Liverpool, June 21, 1822. Her pseudonym was "Silverpen." Among her works are "Struggles for Fame," (a novel, 1845,) "The Doctor's Little Daughter," (1850,) "Lilian's Golden Hours," (1856,) "Life of Wedgwood," (1865–66,) "A Group of Englishmen," (1871,) and "Industrial and Household Tales," (1872.) Died at South Lambeth, April 4, 1879.

Metezeau, mẹh'tẹh'zō', (CLÉMENT,) a French architect, born at Dreux, constructed the great dyke of La Rochelle, which, suggested by Cardinal Richelieu, was the principal means of reducing that city in 1628. Died about 1650.

Method or Méthode. See METHODIUS.

Me-tho'dĭ-us, [Fr. MÉTHODE, mā'tod',] SAINT, one of the early Christian martyrs, surnamed PATARENSIS on account of his having been Bishop of Patara. He was also Bishop of Olympus, in Lycia, and afterwards of Tyre. His piety and learning are highly commended by Epiphanius and Jerome. He wrote a work entitled "The Banquet of Ten Virgins," of which a great part is extant. He suffered martyrdom under Diocletian about 312.

Methodius [Gr. Μεθόδιος] THE CONFESSOR, born at Syracuse, was appointed Patriarch of Constantinople in 842 A.D. He was a zealous advocate of the worship of images, and was the author of several learned works. Died in 846.

Methodius, [Fr. MÉTHODE, mā'tod'; Ger. METHOD, mā'tod,] a native of Thessalonica, was sent, with his brother Cyrillus, by the Greek emperor Michael III., to convert the Saracens on the Euphrates, and about 863 went on a mission to the Slavonians. They invented the Slavonian alphabet, and translated the Psalter and Gospels into Slavonic. Methodius resided in the country nearly thirty years, and, it is said, translated all the Scriptures into Slavonic.

Metternich, von, fon met'ṭẹr-nĪK', (CLEMENS WENZEL,) PRINCE, an eminent Austrian statesman and diplomatist, born at Coblentz in 1773, was a son of Count Metternich, who was a minister of state at Vienna and died in 1818. He was sent as minister to Dresden in 1801, and to Berlin in 1803. In 1806 he became ambassador to Paris, where he remained until the renewal of the war in 1809. After the capture of Vienna and the restoration of peace, he was appointed chancellor and minister of foreign affairs, October, 1809. For more than thirty years from that date he had the chief direction of affairs in Austria. He represented his government at the Congress of Vienna, (1814,) after which he had great influence in European politics. "No diplomatist," says Alison, "even in that age of intellectual giants, excelled, perhaps hardly any equalled, Metternich in the sagacious survey which he took of existing events, and the admirable tact with which he contrived to render them conducive to the interests of his country." ("History of Europe.") In politics he was extremely conservative. He was driven from power and into exile by the revolution of March, 1848. He returned to Vienna in 1851. Died in 1859. "He always comprehended his position," says the "Edinburgh Review" for July, 1858, "and never lost an opportunity. He acted with equal justice and calculation, and never made a retrograde step. His conduct was always politic, and never precipitate." "The Memoirs of Prince Metternich," edited by his son, appeared in 1879.

Metternich, von, (RICHARD CLEMENT JOSEPH HERMANN,) PRINCE, an Austrian diplomatist, a son of the preceding, was born June 7, 1829. He became secretary of legation at Paris in 1854. In 1859, before the Italian war broke out, he was intrusted with a special mission to Paris, and from the close of the war until 1871 he was ambassador at the French court. He was named hereditary councillor of the Austrian empire in 1861, and councillor in 1864.

His first operas, entitled "Jephthah's Daughter" and "Abimelech, or the Two Caliphs," were coldly received, but, having visited Italy in 1815, he there produced his "Romilda e Costanza," (1818,) "Semiramide Riconosciuta," (1819,) and "Emma di Resburgo," (1820,) which met with enthusiastic applause. To these succeeded, in 1824, his "Crociato in Egitto," which was performed with brilliant success in all the principal cities of Europe. His "Robert le Diable," brought out in Paris in 1831, raised his reputation to the highest point, and is ranked among the master-pieces of musical art. He afterwards produced operas entitled "The Huguenots," (1836,) and "Le Prophète," (1849,) both of which were greatly admired. About 1842 he was appointed director-general of music by the King of Prussia. Among his later works are "L'Étoile du Nord," (1854,) and "Le Pardon de Ploermel," (1859.) Died in 1864.

Meyerheim, mī'ẹr-hīm', (FRIEDRICH EDUARD,) a German painter of great merit, born at Dantzic about 1810. He studied at Berlin, and in 1838 became a member of the Academy of Arts in that city. His favourite subjects are rural and domestic scenes, which he represents with exquisite skill and fidelity. Among his masterpieces are "The Blind Beggar," "The Village School," and an "Old Woman Teaching her Granddaughter to Knit." Died in 1879. His brother WILHELM has distinguished himself as a painter of animals, battles, etc.

Meyering, mī'ẹr-ing, (ALBERT,) a Dutch painter born at Amsterdam in 1645; died in 1714.

Meyern, mī'êrn, (WILHELM FRIEDRICH,) a German novelist, born near Anspach in 1762. He wrote a political romance, entitled "Dya-na-Sore, or the Wanderers," (1787.) Died in 1829.

Meyerus. See MEYER, (JACOB.)

Meygret or Meigret, mà'grȧ', (LOUIS,) a French grammarian, born at Lyons about 1510, produced in 1550 a "Treatise on French Grammar," said to be the first which ever appeared. He attempted to introduce a new orthography conformed to the sound. Died after 1560.

Meynell, mā'nel, (ALICE,) a meritorious English poetess, born about 1848, a sister of Mrs. Elizabeth S. Butler, the artist. Her maiden name was THOMPSON. She married in 1877. She wrote "Preludes" (1875) in verse, besides art-criticisms and other writings in prose. Mrs. Meynell owed much to the friendship and praise of Mr. Ruskin.

Meyr, mīr, (MELCHIOR,) a German poet and prose-writer, born near Nördlingen, June 28, 1810. Among his works are "Erzählungen aus dem Ries," (1856–60,) "Gott und sein Reich," (1860,) "Emilie," (1863,) "Gespräche mit einem Grobian," (1866,) "Duell und Ehre," and (1870,) "Gedanken über Kunst, Religion und Philosophie," (1874.) Died at Munich, April 22, 1871.

Meyrick, mêr'ik, (FREDERICK,) an English clergyman, born in 1826, graduated at Trinity College, Oxford, in 1847. He published "The Outcast and Poor of London," (1858,) "The Wisdom of Piety," (1859,) and various books and articles against the Romanists.

Meyrick, mêr'ik, written also Myrick, (Sir SAMUEL RUSH,) an English antiquary, born in 1783. His principal work is a "Critical Inquiry into Ancient Armour, with Special Reference to England from the Norman Conquest to the Time of Charles II.," (1824,) which is highly esteemed. He was knighted in 1832. Died in 1848.

Mézence. See MEZENTIUS.

Mezentius, me-zĕn'she-us, [Gr. Μεσέντιος; Fr. MÉZENCE, mà'zôNss',] a fabulous king of the Etruscans, notorious for his cruelty and impiety. According to Virgil, he was an ally of Turnus, and was killed in battle by Æneas. He was the father of Lausus.

Mézeray, de, dẹh màz'rȧ', (FRANÇOIS EUDES,) a French historian, born in Lower Normandy in 1610, was patronized by Cardinal Richelieu. His principal work is a "History of France," (3 vols., 1651,) which enjoyed extraordinary popularity at the time, owing in great part to the engraved portraits it contained. He succeeded Voiture as a member of the French Academy in 1649, and became perpetual secretary of that institution in 1675. He was also historiographer of France. Died in 1683.

Meziriac, de, dẹh mẹh-ze're'ăk', (CLAUDE GASPAR BACHET,) a French scholar and mathematician, born at Bourg-en-Bresse in 1581. He published an edition of the "Arithmetic" of Diophantus, (with notes,) and translated a number of Ovid's "Epistles" into French verse. Died in 1638.

Mezzofanti, mĕt-so-fân'tee, (GIUSEPPE GASPARO,) a celebrated Italian linguist, born at Bologna in 1774. He studied at the episcopal seminary of his native city, and was ordained a priest in 1797. In 1804 he became professor of Greek and the Oriental languages at Bologna, and in 1815 was appointed chief librarian of the university. Distinguished foreigners who visited Bologna at this time praised his extraordinary attainments and bore witness to the accuracy with which he spoke their respective languages. On the invitation of Pope Gregory XVI., he repaired in 1831 to Rome, where he succeeded Angelo Mai as keeper of the Vatican Library, and in 1838 was made a cardinal. A German scholar says of him at this period, "He is familiar not only with the principal European languages, but with the Irish, Welsh, and even Lappish." He is said to have spoken upwards of fifty languages, and was thoroughly versed in the idioms and provincialisms peculiar to each: he could entertain his English friends with specimens of Yorkshire dialect, and his French or German visitors with the patois of their respective countries. Lord Byron styles Mezzofanti a prodigy of languages, who should have lived in the times of the tower of Babel, to serve as a universal interpreter. Died in 1849.

Michael II., THE STAMMERER, also called MICHAEL THE PHRYGIAN, succeeded Leo the Armenian, whom he had caused to be assassinated, as Emperor of Constantinople, in 820 A.D. He died after a reign of nine years, leaving the empire to his son Theophilus.

Michael III., Emperor of the East, a son of Theophilus, ascended the throne in 842 A.D., when he was about three years old. He was assassinated by Basil the Macedonian in 867. His character was very depraved.

See GIBBON, "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire."

Michael IV., surnamed THE PAPHLAGONIAN, [Gr. Μιχαὴλ ὁ Παφλαγών,] became emperor in 1034, having previously married Zoe, widow of Romanus III., whom she had put to death. He died in 1041, and was succeeded by his nephew, Michael Calaphates.

Michael V., surnamed CALAPHATES, [Gr. ὁ Καλαφάτης,] was made Emperor of the East in 1041, but he was deposed by his subjects in 1042.

Michael VI., Emperor of the East, surnamed STRATIOT'ICUS, began to reign in 1056. He was deposed in 1057, and was succeeded by Isaac Comnenus.

Michael VII., surnamed PARAPINA'CES, a son of Constantine XI., succeeded Romanus III. in 1071. He was feeble and incompetent to reign, and he abdicated in 1078.

Michael VIII. Palæol'ogus, [Gr. Μιχαὴλ ὁ Παλαιολόγος; Fr. MICHEL PALÉOLOGUE, me'shĕl' pā'lā'o'log',] Emperor of the East, and a son of Androni'cus Palæologus, was born in 1224. He usurped in 1260 the throne of John Lascaris, the infant heir of the late Emperor of Nicæa. In 1261 his army took Constantinople from the Latin ruler, Baldwin II. He was excommunicated by the Patriarch Arsenius for his cruel treatment of John Lascaris, whom he deprived of sight. Under his auspices the Eastern and Western Churches made a treaty of union in 1274; but this attempt to restore the union proved abortive. In 1281 he defeated the army which Charles of Anjou and the pope sent to invade the Eastern empire. He died in 1282, and was succeeded by his son, Androni'cus II.

Mī'cha-ĕl An'gĕ-lo [Fr. MICHEL-ANGE, me'shĕl' ŏNzh; It. MICHELANGELO, me-kĕl-ân'jà-lo; Lat. MICHAEL AN'GELUS] Buonarotti (boo-o-nâ-rot'tee) or Buonarroti, a celebrated Italian painter, sculptor, and architect, was born in the castle of Caprese, in Tuscany, on the 6th of March, 1474. He was descended from the noble family of Canossa. At the time of his birth, his father, Lodovico Buonarotti Simone, was podesta or governor of Chiusi and Caprese. His mother's name was Francesca del Sera. He attended a grammar-school in Florence, and became in 1488 a pupil of Domenico Ghirlandaio. Soon after that date he began to study sculpture in an academy, or garden, which Lorenzo the Magnificent had furnished with antique statues and bas-reliefs, in Florence. He gained the favour of Lorenzo, who about 1490 invited him to become an inmate of his palace and treated him with much respect and kindness. Here he enjoyed the society of eminent literary men, one of whom, Angelo Poliziano, (Politian,) became his intimate friend. Among his earliest works was a marble bas-relief, the subject of which was "The Battle of Hercules with the Centaurs." This work, which was approved by his own mature judgment, is preserved in Florence. His patron, Lorenzo de' Medici, died in 1492, and was succeeded by his degenerate son Piero, by whose order Michael Angelo made a colossal statue of snow. In 1494 he went to Bologna, where he worked about a year. Having returned to Florence, he executed a statue of a "Sleeping Cupid," which some person passed off as an antique and sold for a high price to Cardinal San Giorgio. About 1497 he produced an admirable marble group, called a "Pietà," representing "The Virgin weeping over the Dead Body of her Son." "In none of his works," says Ernest Breton, "has he displayed more perfect knowledge of design and anatomy, or more profound truth of expression." ("Nouvelle Biographie Générale.") This group now adorns a chapel in the church of Saint Peter at Rome. He found another patron in Pietro Soderini, the gonfaloniere (chief ruler) of Florence, who employed him in sculpture and painting. He executed a gigantic marble statue of the psalmist David, which stands in front of the Palazzo Vecchio, in Florence. He received four hundred ducats for this work, on which he spent about eighteen months and which he finished in 1504. Having been commissioned by Soderini to paint in fresco a historical picture in the hall of the ducal palace, he chose for his subject an event in the war between the Florentines and the people of Pisa. He displayed in the cartoon of this composition a grandeur of style and a knowledge of anatomy which had not been equalled by any modern painter. "Such was the excellence of this work," says Vasari, "that some thought it absolute perfection." This cartoon has perished, and the painting itself was never begun. Among his early paintings is an oil-picture of the "Holy Family," (about 1504.) He was invited to Rome by Julius II. soon after the accession of that pontiff, who employed him to build his monument or mausoleum. He formed a magnificent design for this work, which design was approved by the pope and has been described by Vasari, but was never completely executed. While they were consulting about a suitable place for the monument, the architect, San Gallo, suggested that a new chapel ought to be built expressly for so superb a mausoleum. The pope concurred in his opinion, and determined to rebuild the church of Saint Peter. Thus Michael Angelo's design is said to have been the cause of the erection of the most magnificent church in the world. In 1506 he was offended at the pope because he was not admitted to his presence when he went to the palace on business. He therefore abruptly quitted his service, and retired to Florence. Julius II. sent messengers to bring him back, but he refused to return, until the pope had urged him by several letters and mandates. Michael Angelo wished to finish the monument which he had begun, but Julius had changed his mind, and ordered the great artist to decorate with frescos the ceiling and walls of the Sistine Chapel in the Vatican. He painted in the Sistine Chapel numerous scenes from the book of Genesis, and colossal figures of prophets and sibyls. "From the commencement," says Duppa, "to the conclusion of this stupendous monument of human genius, twenty months only were employed. So short a time for the completion of so vast a work could hardly be credited, if it were not more difficult to refuse the testimony on which it is supported." It was finished in 1512. Michael Angelo and Raphael worked in the Vatican at the same time.

Julius II. died in 1513, and was succeeded by Leo X., who is censured for his illiberal conduct towards Michael Angelo. Leo ordered him to build the façade of the church of San Lorenzo at Florence, and compelled him against his will to spend several years in procuring marble for that purpose. "It is a mortifying reflection," says Duppa, "that the talents of this great man should have been buried and his time consumed, during the whole reign of Leo X., in little else than in raising stone out of a quarry and making a road to convey it to the sea." ("Life of M. Angelo.") Under the patronage of Clement VII., who was elected pope in 1523, he began to build the library and chapel of San Lorenzo, at Florence. He erected fortifications at Florence in 1528 or 1529, and aided in the defence of that city against the papal troops. After the accession of Pope Paul III., in 1534, Michael Angelo was permitted to resume the monument of Julius II., which he completed on a smaller scale than that which he first designed. It consists of seven statues, one of which represents Moses, and was placed in the church of San Pietro in Vinculo. This statue of Moses is called one of his master-pieces.

Among his greatest productions is a picture, in fresco, of "The Last Judgment," in the Sistine Chapel, Rome. This work, which occupied him about eight years and comprises nearly three hundred figures, was finished in 1541. It presents a confused mass of naked bodies in the most violent attitudes and most admired disorder, and excels chiefly in energy of expression. "In the 'Last Judgment,'" says E. Breton, "one will seek in vain for that celestial light and divine inspiration which appear in the 'Transfiguration,'" (of Raphael.)

In 1546 he was appointed architect of Saint Peter's Church, which Julius II. began to build about 1506. Michael Angelo accepted this appointment on the conditions that he should receive no salary, and that he should deviate from the design of San Gallo, the former architect of the church. He adopted a more simple design, formed a model for the dome, and devoted the remainder of his life chiefly to that grand fabric, but did not live to see it completed. He finished the Farnese palace, which is greatly admired, and is one of the most imposing edifices of modern Rome. In his latter years he adorned the Capitoline Hill with several fine buildings, among which is the senatorial palace. He was the author of numerous sonnets and other poems, which are distinguished for elegance and purity of style. These were published in 1538, and often reprinted. He never married. He died in Rome in February, 1563, or, according to some authorities, in 1564. His moral character is represented as good.

"He was the bright luminary," says Sir Joshua Reynolds, "from whom painting has borrowed a new lustre, under whose hands it assumed a new appearance and became another and superior art, and from whom all his contemporaries and successors have derived whatever they have possessed of the dignified and majestic." ("Discourses on Painting," vol. ii.) Comparing him with Raphael, Quatremère de Quincy remarks, "If Michael Angelo is the greatest of draughtsmen, Raffaello is the first of painters." ("Life of Raffaello.") "In painting," says Duppa, "the great work on which Michael Angelo's fame depends, and, taking it for all in all, the greatest work of his whole life, is the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel. . . . His Sibyls and prophets exhibit with variety and energy the colossal powers of his mind. . . . In his great works, his superior abilities are shown in the sublimity of his conceptions and the power and facility with which they are executed." It is doubtful whether any oil-painting by this artist is now extant.

Michaux, mē'shō', (ANDRÉ,) a distinguished French botanist and traveller, born at Versailles in 1746. After having traversed Persia and other countries, he was sent by the government to North America in 1785 for the purpose of collecting trees and plants. For about eleven years he thoroughly explored the botanical productions of the United States, Canada, etc., with a courage and energy which no danger or difficulty could overcome. In 1796 he returned to France with his collections, and prepared his "Description of the Oaks of North America," (1801.) He accompanied Baudin's scientific expedition to Australia in 1800, and, while pursuing his researches in Madagascar, he died of fever in 1802. He left a "Flora of North America," ("Flora Boreali-Americana," 2 vols., 1803,) which for many years was the most complete that had appeared. Both of his works are adorned with excellent engravings by Redouté.

He was chosen chief of the historical department of the archives of France in 1830, before which he had published several historical works for schools. About 1832 he was appointed the substitute or successor of Guizot as professor of history at the Sorbonne. He published in 1831 a "Roman History: the Republic," and in 1833 the first volume of his "History of France." In 1838 he obtained the chair of history and moral science in the College of France, and was elected a member of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences. He distinguished himself as an adversary of the Jesuits and of Romanism. After the coup-d'état of December, 1851, refusing to take the oath, he lost his place in the archives, and his chair in the College of France. His principal works are a "History of the French Revolution," (7 vols., 1847–53,) a "History of France," (14 vols., 1833–62,) "Love," ("L'Amour," 1858,) and "Woman," ("La Femme," 1859.) These have been translated into English and often reprinted. His histories present a profusion of poetical images, with a brilliant style and ingenious generalizations. He also wrote "A Sketch (Précis) of Modern History," (1833,) "The Sea," ("La Mer," 1861,) "The Bible of Humanity," ("La Bible de l'Humanité," 1864,) and two posthumous works, "The Soldiers of the Revolution," (1878,) and "The Banquet," (1879.) Died at the Iles d'Hyères, February 10, 1874.

Michelet, mĕsh'ẹh-lā', (KARL LUDWIG,) a distinguished German philosopher of the school of Hegel, was born at Berlin in 1801. He was appointed in 1825 professor of philosophy and philology in the French gymnasium at Berlin, and in 1829 obtained the chair of philosophy in the university. He published "The Ethics of Aristotle in their Relation to the System of Morality," (1827,) "Critical Examination of Aristotle's Metaphysics," (in French, 1836,) which was crowned by the Academy of Moral Sciences of Paris, "History of the Last Systems of Philosophy in Germany, from Kant to Hegel," (1837,) and other works of high repute. Died in 1876.

Micheli, me-kā'lee, (ANDREA,) an Italian painter, called ANDREA VICENTINO, born at Vicenza in 1539. He was a good colorist, but lacked invention. Died in 1614.

Micheli, (DOMENICO,) a Venetian statesman, became Doge of Venice in 1117. He conducted a fleet in a crusade to Palestine in 1123, and took Tyre in 1124. Died in 1130.

Micheli, me-kā'lee, or Michieli, me-ke-ā'lee, [Lat. MICHE'LIUS,] (PIERO ANTONIO,) an eminent Italian botanist, born at Florence in 1679, was appointed by Cosimo de' Medici superintendent of his botanical garden. He gave particular attention to the classification of the mosses, fungi, and lichens. His principal work, published in 1729, is entitled "Nova Plantarum Genera," in folio, with plates, and is praised in high terms by Haller. Linnæus has named the genus Michelia in honour of this botanist. Died in 1737.

Micheli, (VITALE,) a Venetian commander, elected Doge of Venice in 1096, sent a large fleet to co-operate with the leaders of the first crusade. Died in 1102.

See DARU, "Histoire de Venise."

Micheli du Crest, mĕsh'le' dü krĕ, (JACQUES BARTHÉLEMY,) a Swiss mathematician and astronomer, born at Geneva in 1690, published, among other works, a "Description of a Universal Thermometer," of which he was the inventor. Died in 1766.

Michelis, mē-kā'lis, (FRIEDRICH,) a German Old-Catholic theologian, born at Münster, July 27, 1815. He became a priest, was professor of history and philology in the seminary of Paderborn from 1849 to 1854, and later was professor of philosophy in the Lyceum at Brunswick. He supported Döllinger and followed him in the Old-Catholic movement. He published a "History of Philosophy," (1867,) "Nature and Revelation," and many other works, philosophical, theological, and controversial. Died in 1886.

Michelius. See MICHELI.

Mich'ell, (JOHN,) an English scientist, born about 1725. He was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, where he became professor of geology. He was afterwards rector of Thornhill, Yorkshire. He is remembered as the inventor of the Torsion Balance, and the author of a "Treatise of Artificial Magnets," (1750,) and other works of value. Died in 1793.

Michelot, mĕsh'lo', (PIERRE MARIE JOSEPH,) a French actor, born in Paris in 1785; died in 1856.

Michelozzi, me-kĕ-lot'see, or Michelozzo, me-kĕ-lot'so, a Florentine sculptor and architect, was a pupil of Brunelleschi. He furnished the design for the Riccardi palace and for the chapel of the Annunciation at Florence. Died in 1470.

See VASARI, "Lives of the Painters, Architects," etc.; QUATREMÈRE DE QUINCY, "Vies des Architectes illustres."

Michelsen, me'kẹl-sẹn, (ANDREAS LUDWIG JAKOB,) a German jurist and historian, born in Sleswick in 1801, became professor of law at Jena in 1842. Died in 1881.

Michelson, mee'kẹl-son, (IVAN,) a famous Russian general, born in Livonia in 1735; died in 1807.

Michiel, me-ke-ĕl', (GIUSTINA RENIER,) a learned Italian lady, born at Venice in 1755. She translated "Macbeth" and "Othello" into Italian, and published "Feste Veneziane," (5 vols., 1817–27.) Died in 1832.

Michieli. See MICHELI.

Michiels, me'she-ĕl', (JOSEPH ALFRED XAVIER,) a French littérateur, born at Rome in 1813. He published, besides other works, a "History of Flemish and Dutch Painting," "History of the Franco-Prussian War," etc.

Mĭ-çip'sạ, [Gr. Μικίψας,] King of Numidia, was a son of Masinissa, at whose death, in 148 B.C., the kingdom was divided between Micipsa and his brothers, Gulussa and Mastanabal. After the death of these two, who survived their father but a short time, he was king of all Numidia. He was an ally of the Romans. Died in 118 B.C.

Mickiewicz, mĭts-ke-ā'vitch, (ADAM,) a celebrated Polish poet, born in Lithuania in 1798. He studied at the University of Wilna, where he became intimate with several distinguished patriots and joined the secret societies opposed to the Russian government. He published in 1822 a collection of poems, which at once established his reputation as the greatest poet his country had produced. He was banished in 1824 to the interior of Russia, on a charge of conspiring against the government, and while residing at Odessa wrote his "Crimean Sonnets." Having been permitted to leave Russia, in 1828 he visited Germany and Rome, and in 1834 took up his residence in Paris. He was appointed in 1840 professor of the Slavonic language and literature in the College of France, where he lectured for a time with great success. His subsequent connection with the Polish fanatic Towianski, who inculcated the worship of Napoleon Bonaparte, deprived him of his popularity and he was ordered to quit Paris by the government. He was sent by Louis Napoleon on a mission to Constantinople in 1855, and died soon after his arrival. His principal works are his "Grajina," a historic picture of Lithuania in early times, "Konrad Wallenrod," (1830,) the "Ancestors," ("Dziady," 1832,)—in the first part of which he gives the story of his unfortunate attachment to the sister of a fellow-student, and in the latter describes his imprisonment at Wilna,—and "Pan Tadeusz," (1833.)

Mickle or Meikle, mĭk'ẹl, (WILLIAM JULIUS,) a Scottish poet and translator, born in Dumfriess-shire in 1734. Having visited London in 1763, he published several poems, which obtained for him the patronage of Lord Lyttleton, and in 1775 brought out his translation of the "Lusiad" of Camoens. It had great popularity in England, and procured for him the honour of admission to the Royal Academy of Lisbon. This work, however, is far from being a faithful version of the original; and Hallam observes that Mickle's "infidelities in translation exceed all liberties ever taken in this way." He also published several popular ballads, one of which, entitled "Cumnor Hall," suggested to Sir Walter Scott his romance of "Kenilworth." Died in 1788.

See CARY, "Lives of English Poets from Johnson to Kirke White;" CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen;" "Monthly Review" for September, 1771, and April, May, and July, 1776.

Micklucho-Maclay, mik-loo'ko-mą-klī', (NIKOLAS,) a Russian traveller, born in 1846, was the son of a nobleman. He studied at the University of Saint Petersburg. In 1866 he went with Haeckel to Madeira, in 1867 to the Canaries, and in 1869 to Morocco. After visiting South America, Tahiti, and Samoa, he in 1871–72 made the first of his celebrated journeys in Papua. He also travelled in Indo-China and in other little-known regions, making important geographical discoveries. Died 1888.

Mĭ'con, [Gr. Μίκων,] an eminent Athenian painter and sculptor, flourished about the middle of the fifth century B.C. He was chosen by his countrymen to paint the walls of the temple of Theseus at Athens. His pictures representing the battles of the Amazons and Centaurs were especially admired for the skill displayed in the delineation of the horses. There were several other Greek artists named Micon.

Micrelius or Micrælius, me-krā'le-ŭs, (JOHANN,) a German historical writer, born at Cöslin in 1597. He taught philosophy at Stettin, and published, besides other works, "Lexicon Philosophicum," (1653,) and "Royal Political Science," ("Regia Politica Scientia" 1654.) Died in 1658.

Mī'das, [Gr. Μίδας,] a Phrygian king, who, according to tradition, requested of Bacchus that all he touched might turn to gold, and was gratified by the grant of that wish. Being thus in danger of starvation, he could only escape the curse he had brought upon himself by bathing in the Pactolus, which ever after flowed with sands of gold. It is also related of him that, having decided in favour of Pan in his musical contest with Apollo, Midas's ears were changed to those of an ass, which he endeavoured to conceal. They were at length discovered by a servant, who, unable to retain the secret, whispered it in a pit in the ground, and the reeds which grew around the spot revealed his disgrace, murmuring in the winds the words, "King Midas has asses' ears." This fable was a favourite theme with the Athenian dramatists.

Middelburg, de, deh mid'del-bŭRH', (PAUL,) a Dutch mathematician and writer, born at Middelburg in 1445, became professor of mathematics at Padua. He was made Bishop of Fossombrone in 1494. Died in 1534.

Middendorp, van, vän mid'den-dorp', (JAKOB,) a Dutch historian, born in Overyssel in 1537. His histories are not reliable. Died in 1611.

Mid'dĭ-măn, (SAMUEL,) an English engraver, born in 1746. He engraved landscapes with success. Died in 1818.

Mid'dle-tŏn, (ARTHUR,) an American statesman, born in South Carolina, succeeded Nicholson as governc of that colony in 1725.

Middleton, (ARTHUR,) an American patriot of the Revolution, born in South Carolina in 1743, was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He took the degree of A.B. at Cambridge, England, and after his return was a delegate from his native State to the United States Congress in 1776. He was subsequently re-elected in 1782. Died in 1787.

Mid'dle-tŏn, (CONYERS,) a celebrated English scholar, divine, and controversialist, born in Yorkshire in 1683. He studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow in 1706. He was created D.D. in 1717, on which occasion he opposed the claims of Bentley (then regius professor of divinity) to an exorbitant fee. A lawsuit followed, in which Bentley was defeated. Middleton published, soon after, "A Full and Impartial Account of the Proceedings in the University of Cambridge against Dr. Bentley," which, though highly vindictive in its tone, is esteemed a master-piece of English style. He was appointed chief librarian of the university about 1720. Having visited Italy in 1724, he published, after his return, his "Letter from Rome," (1729,) in which he maintains that "the religion of the present Romans is derived from their heathen ancestors." Having brought upon himself the charge of infidelity by this work and succeeding publications, he wrote a pamphlet in defence of his orthodoxy, which, however, failed to remove the unfavourable impression he had made. He brought out in 1741 his "History of the Life of M. T. Cicero," which, though marred with some grave defects, was received with extraordinary favour. "Never," says Macaulay, "was there a character which it was easier to read than that of Cicero. Never was there a mind keener or more critical than that of Middleton. But the great Iconoclast was himself an idolater, and, while he disputed with no small ability the claims of Cyprian and Athanasius to a place in the calendar, was himself composing a lying legend in honour of Saint Tully." In 1749 he published "A Free Inquiry into the Miraculous Powers of the Christian Church," in which he insists that the Protestant clergy should deny the authority of the Fathers entirely, or admit the truth of the leading Catholic doctrines. Died in 1750.

See "Encyclopædia Britannica;" E. MIDDLETON, "Evangelical Biography;" CHALMERS, "Biographical Dictionary;" "Biographia Britannica."

Middleton, (EDWARD,) an English gentleman, born at Twickenham, settled in South Carolina, and was the founder of a family which produced several distinguished statesmen.

Middleton, (ERASMUS,) an English writer, published a "Dictionary of Arts and Sciences," and a collection of lives of eminent Protestant theologians, entitled "Biographia Evangelica." Died in 1805.

Middleton, (HENRY,) son of Arthur Middleton, Governor of South Carolina, was president of Congress in 1775.

Middleton, (Sir HENRY,) an English navigator, born about 1570, entered the service of the East India Company. In 1610 he conducted an expedition to Mocha, Surat, and Bantam. Died in 1615.

Middleton, (HENRY,) an American statesman under the administration of President Monroe, was elected Governor of South Carolina, and in 1820 was minister to Russia. Died in 1846. His son HENRY, born in Paris in 1797, has published several political treatises.

Middleton, (Sir HUGH,) a wealthy citizen of London, born about 1565, is chiefly known from the important service he rendered to London by uniting two streams in Hertfordshire and Middlesex, for supplying the city with water. The stream formed by this junction, called the New River, was conveyed a distance of about thirty-eight miles. He was made a baronet in 1622. Died in 1631.

See LYSONS, "Environs of London."

Middleton, (JOHN IZARD,) son of Arthur, noticed above, (1743–87,) was born in 1785. He wrote a work entitled "The Cyclopean Walls." Died in 1849.

Middleton, (THOMAS,) an English dramatist, flourished during the reigns of Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I. Nothing is known of his life, except that he was chronologer to the city of London in 1620. Two of his principal plays are entitled "A Mad World, my Masters," and "The Roaring Girl." The latter is said to be a true picture of London life at that time. Middleton also assisted Rowley, Fletcher, and Jonson in the composition of several of their plays. One of his dramas, entitled "The Witch," is supposed to have furnished Shakspeare with the witch-scenes in "Macbeth." Died about 1626.

See CAMPBELL, "Specimens of the British Poets;" BAKER, "Biographia Dramatica."

Middleton, (THOMAS FANSHAWE,) D.D., an English prelate, born in Derbyshire in 1769. He took his degree in 1808, and was appointed Archdeacon of Huntingdon in 1812. Soon after this the government having decided to constitute a bishopric in India, Dr. Middleton was consecrated first Bishop of Calcutta, in 1814. Having previously been made a Fellow of the Royal Society, he set sail for India. He laid the foundation of the Bishops' College at Calcutta, in 1820, and established a consistory court in that city. While zealously engaged in his duties, he was attacked with a fever, of which he died in 1822. His principal work is entitled "The Doctrine of the Greek Article applied to the Criticism and Illustration of the New Testament."

Mid'gard's* Serpent, (or Mĭðgarðsormr, mith'-garthz-ORMR',) called also the World-Serpent, and Jörmungand, in the Norse mythology, the great serpent which surrounds the world, the offspring of Loki and the female Jötun Angurboda, (Angrboða.) The gods, having learned that the children of Loki and Angurboda were destined at some future day to be fatal to them, determined to get possession of those children while they were still young. They were accordingly brought, and Midgard's Serpent was cast into the ocean, where it grew till it encircled the world, biting its own tail. At the end of the world (Ragnaröck) the world-serpent will fight among the enemies of the gods and be slain by Thor, who, however, will die immediately afterwards from the effect of its venom. The myth of the world-serpent is supposed to signify the deep or main ocean, which, excited by Loki, (subterranean fire or earth-

Midhat Pasha, mid'hât pâ'shâ, a Turkish statesman, born in Constantinople in 1822. In 1845 he entered the civil service as a clerk, and he was afterwards employed in various positions of high trust. In 1857 he crushed out brigandage in Roumelia, and soon after he became acting governor of Bulgaria. In 1860 he was made a pasha, and was appointed governor of Southern Albania. In 1864 he was commissioned as governor-general of Bulgaria. He was then successively president of the council of state, grand vizier, governor of Bagdad, and minister of justice. He was concerned in the deposition of Abdool Azeez and of Moorâd V., and in 1876 again became grand vizier, but was soon banished. In 1878 he was appointed governor-general of Syria. In 1881 he was condemned to death on the charge of having murdered the Sultan Abdool Azeez, but was finally banished to Southern Arabia. Died May 11, 1884.

Mieczyslaw, me-êtch'is-lâv, [Lat. MICCISLA'US or MICISLA'US,] I., surnamed THE GLORIOUS, called also Miesko, (me-ês'ko,) Duke of Poland, was born at Posen in 931. Having become converted to Christianity, he showed great zeal in its promulgation and the extirpation of paganism. He died in 992. A monument, by Rauch, was erected to his memory at Posen.

See KADLUBECK, "Annales;" SEIDEL, "Von dem ersten christlichen Polnischen Fürsten Miecislas," 1752.

Mieczyslaw or Miesko II., King of Poland, born in 990, succeeded to the throne in 1025. He was deficient in talent and energy, and lost a considerable portion of his territory to the Germans and Hungarians. He died in 1034, and was succeeded by his son, Casimir I.

Miel, meel, or Meel, mâl, (JAN,) or GIOVANNI DELLO VITE, (jo-vân'nee dêl'lo vee'tà,) a celebrated Flemish painter, born near Antwerp in 1599. He was a pupil of Andrea Sacchi, but he afterwards adopted the style of Bamboccio. His favourite subjects were pastoral and hunting scenes, gypsies, beggars, and carnivals, in which he has never been surpassed. He was patronized by Charles Emmanuel, Duke of Savoy, who made him his painter and presented him with a diamond cross of great value. Many of the best works of this artist are in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. Died in 1664.

Migne, mēn, (Jacques Paul,) Abbé, a French priest, born at Saint-Flour, October 25, 1800. He was ordained in 1824, and became an editor. He founded "L'Univers," a newspaper, in 1833. He established an enormous business as a publisher and editor of religious books, employing a large staff of writers and collaborateurs. He issued "Scripturæ Sacræ Cursus Completus," (28 vols.,) "Theologiæ Cursus Completus," (28 vols.,) "Encyclopédie théologique," (171 vols., 1844–60,) and a very large number of other works. Died at Paris, October 25, 1875.

Mignet, mēn'yā', (François Auguste Marie,) a distinguished French historian, born at Aix, May 8, 1796. He was educated at the College of Avignon, and studied law in his native city, where M. Thiers was his fellow-student. Having removed to Paris in 1821, he became editor of the "Courrier Français." He brought out in 1824 his "History of the French Revolution from 1789 to 1814," (2 vols. 8vo,) which had extraordinary success and was translated into the principal European languages. In 1830 he was associated with Thiers and Armand Carrel as editor of the "National," and was one of the journalists who protested against the subversion of the freedom of the press by the edict of July, 1830. He was soon after appointed archivist in the ministry of foreign affairs, and councillor of state. He was elected a member of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences in 1832, and in 1837 became perpetual secretary of that institution, and succeeded Raynouard in the French Academy. Mignet published, besides the history above named, "Introduction to the Negotiations relative to the Spanish Succession under Louis XIV.," (1842,) "Antonio Perez and Philip II.," (1845,) "History of Mary Stuart," (1851,) "Charles Quint, son Abdication, son Séjour et sa Mort au Monastère de Yuste," (1854,) "Éloges historiques," (1864,) and "Rivalité de François I et Charles V," (1875.) Mih-Teih, mĭh-tā', or Mé-Teih, an eminent Chinese philosopher, who lived about 400 B.C. Dr. Legge says of him that he was an original thinker, and exercised a bolder judgment on things than Confucius or any of his followers. He taught that all the evils in society arise from the want of mutual universal love. For example, a prince loves only his own state, and does not love the neighbouring state. Therefore he makes war against it. "If princes," he asked, "regarded other states as their own, who would begin a war? If every one regarded his neighbour's person as his own, who would be found to rob? If universal love prevailed, all enmities, usurpations, and miseries would disappear. Princes, loving one another, would have no battle-fields; the chiefs of families, loving one another, would attempt no usurpations; men, loving one another, would commit no robberies."

See Dr. Legge, "Chinese Classics," vol. ii. chap. iii.

Mikhailofski Danilefski or Michailowski Danilewski, me-kī-lof'skee dâ-ne-lĕf'skee, (Alexander Ivanovitch,) a Russian general and historical writer, born in 1790, served with distinction in the principal campaigns against the French from 1812 to 1815, and in the Turkish war of 1829. He published, among other works, an "Account of the Campaign in France in 1814." Died in 1848.

Miklosich, mik'lo-zik', (Franz,) a German linguist, profoundly versed in the Slavonian language, born at Luttenberg, in Styria, in 1813. He wrote a "Lexicon of the Old Slavonian Language," (in Latin, 1850,) a "Comparative Grammar of the Slavonian Languages," (1852–56,) "Language of the Bulgarians of Transylvania," (1856,) "On the Dialects and the Wanderings of the Gypsies of Europe," (1872–77,) etc. Died in 1891.

Milan (mee'lân) I., King of Servia, was born at Jassy, August 10, 1854. He was a grand-nephew of Milos Obrenovitch, and was adopted as his heir by his second cousin, Michael III., (Obrenovitch,) Prince of Servia. When Michael was murdered in 1868, Prince Milan was at school in Paris, but he at once returned to Servia, and was in 1872 crowned at Belgrade as Prince Milan IV. In 1876 he declared war against Turkey, joining the Montenegrins and Bosnians in an unfortunate campaign against his suzerain the Sultan. In the same year he was proclaimed king, but he was not generally so recognized until his next proclamation of 1882, Servia having in the mean time been recognized as an independent nation. His queen is Natalie, a Russian lady, born September 7, 1859.

Milani, me-lâ'nee, (Aurelio or Aureliano,) an Italian painter, born at Bologna in 1675, was a successful imitator of the style of the Caracci. Died in 1749.

Milano, da, dâ me-lâ'no, (Giovanni,) an Italian painter, was a native of Milan. He was a favourite pupil of Taddeo Gaddi, whom he assisted in several important works. He lived about 1370–90.

Milanollo, me-lâ-nol'lo, (Teresa,) an Italian violinist, born at Sevigliano, near Turin, in 1827. Before she was seven years old she made her first public appearance in Turin, and she was subsequently taken to Paris by her father, where she met with great success. Her younger sister, Maria, born in 1832, now began to show almost equal talent, and the sisters henceforth appeared together, making tours through France, Germany, England, and Italy. Maria died in 1848, and Teresa soon afterwards married M. Parmentier and retired to private life.

Milbourne, mil'bŭrn, (Luke,) an English writer and divine, born in 1667, published a "Poetical Translation of the Psalms," (1698,) "Notes on Dryden's Virgil," and other works. He is one of the authors satirized in Pope's "Dunciad." Died in 1720.

See Johnson, "Life of Dryden;" Malone's edition of the Works of Dryden.

Mil'burn, (William Henry,) a Methodist divine, known as "the Blind Preacher," born at Philadelphia in 1823. Having visited England in 1859, he gave lectures in the principal cities, and attracted large audiences by his eloquence. He published "Ten Years of Preacher Life," (1859,) and "The Pioneers and People of the Mississippi Valley," (1860.)

Milder-Hauptmann, mĭl'dẹr-hŏwpt'män, (PAULINE ANNA,) a German soprano-singer, born at Constantinople, of Austrian parentage, in 1785. She made her first appearance in opera in Vienna, April 9, 1803, with brilliant success. In 1810 she married a rich jeweller named Hauptmann. After making a professional tour of the principal German towns, she settled in Berlin in 1816, singing at the royal theatre for twelve years. In 1829 she visited Russia, Sweden, and Denmark. Died at Berlin in 1838.

Mild'may, (Sir WALTER,) an eminent English statesman and scholar, born in 1522, was distinguished by the favour of Henry VIII. and Edward VI., and held the office of chancellor of the exchequer under Elizabeth for more than twenty years. He was a liberal patron of learning, and founded Emanuel College, Cambridge. Died in 1589.

Miles, mīlz, (DIXON H.,) an American officer, born in Maryland about 1803, graduated at West Point in 1824. He became a colonel in 1859, and served at Bull Run, July 21, 1861. He commanded at Harper's Ferry, and there surrendered about 11,500 men, September 16, 1862. He was killed by a shell thrown after the surrender. "It is impossible," says Greeley, "to resist the conclusion that Miles, in this affair, acted the part of a traitor." ("American Conflict," vol. ii. p. 202.)

Miles, (JAMES WARLEY,) an American scholar and missionary, born at Charleston, South Carolina, about 1819. He became professor of Greek and history at Charleston College. He was a contributor to the "Southern Review," and published various works in prose and verse. Died in 1875.

Mill, (HENRY,) an English engineer, born in London about 1680. He supplied the town of Northampton with water, and was appointed principal engineer to the New River Company.

Mill, (JAMES,) a British historian and writer on political economy, born at Montrose, in Scotland, in 1773. He studied at Edinburgh, and distinguished himself by his attainments in the Greek language, metaphysics, and moral philosophy. Having removed to London in 1800, he became a contributor to the "Edinburgh Review" and other periodicals. He published (1817–19) his 'History of British India," (in 5 vols. 8vo,) a work of great merit, which procured for him the office of head of the department of Indian correspondence in the India House. "We know of no work," says Mr. Grote, "which surpasses his 'History of British India' in the main excellences attainable by historical writers,—industrious accumulation, continued for many years, of original authorities, careful and conscientious criticism of their statements, and a large command of psychological analysis, enabling the author to interpret phenomena of society both extremely complicated and far removed from his own personal experience." (See "Review of J. S. Mill's Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy," London, 1868.) Among his other productions are a series of essays on "Jurisprudence," "Liberty of the Press," "Law of Nations," etc. These, first published in the "Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica," were very favourably received, and were followed by his "Elements of Political Economy," which appeared in 1821, and his "Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind," in 1829. Mill was an intimate friend of Jeremy Bentham, and one of the ablest expounders of his system. Died in 1836.

Mill, [Lat. MIL'LIUS,] (JOHN,) an English theologian and pulpit orator, born in Westmoreland about 1645. He became chaplain-in-ordinary to Charles II. in 1681, and in 1704 was made a canon of Canterbury. He published a critical edition of the New Testament in Greek, (1707,) which is highly esteemed. Died in 1707.

See CHALMERS, "General Biographical Dictionary."

Mill, (JOHN STUART,) an eminent English philosopher and economist, son of James Mill, author of the "History of British India," was born in London in May, 1806. He was educated at home by his father, and entered in 1823 the service of the East India Company as a clerk in the India House. In his early life he contributed to the "Edinburgh Review" and the "Westminster Review." He published in 1843 a "System of Logic, Rationative and Inductive," (2 vols.,) and, in 1844, "Essays on some Unsettled Questions in Political Economy." He acquired a high reputation by a popular work entitled "The Principles of Political Economy, with some of their Applications to Social Philosophy," (1848.) As a writer he was distinguished by originality of thought and acuteness in reasoning. In political principles he was an advanced Liberal, and all his sympathies were in favour of liberty and progress. About 1850 he married Harriet Taylor, a lady of rare intellectual powers. He became examiner of Indian correspondence in 1856. During the rebellion in the United States, Mr. Mill was among the few prominent English writers who defended the cause of the North and of the Federal Union. Among his later works were an "Essay on Liberty" and "An Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy," (1865,) of which a highly favourable review from the pen of Mr. Grote, the historian, has been published, (London, 1868.) He was for some time editor of the "Westminster Review." In 1865 he was elected a member of Parliament for Westminster. He became an able debater, and made several speeches in favour of reform and extension of the elective franchise in 1866 and 1867. His career as a legislator was very successful. "Mr. Mill's success," says the "New York Commercial Advertiser," August 29, 1867, "has been the most marked and decided in the annals of Parliament. No man has ever before acquired so high a consideration in so short a time." He was, however, defeated in the general election of 1868. Mr. Mill distinguished himself as an earnest and able advocate of the rights of women. In his work entitled "The Subjection of Women," (1869,) he takes the ground "that the principle which regulates the existing social relations between the two sexes—the legal subordination of one sex to the other—is wrong in itself, and now one of the chief hindrances to human improvement, and that it ought to be replaced by a principle of perfect equality." Died May 8, 1873.

Millais, mil'lā', (JOHN EVERETT,) an English painter, of French extraction, born at Southampton in 1829, was one of the founders of what is called the "Pre-Raphaelite School." He studied at the Royal Academy, and at an early age produced several works of superior merit, among which was "The Benjamites seizing the Daughters of Shiloh." His "Return of the Dove to the Ark," "Child of the Regiment," "Ophelia," "The Order of Release," and "Joan of Arc" are among his most admired productions. He is a Royal Academician, and was decorated with the legion of honour in 1878.

Mil'lar, (JOHN,) an eminent Scottish jurist, born in Lanarkshire in 1735. He studied at Glasgow, where he became in 1761 professor of civil law. The spirited and attractive style of his lectures, which, says a critic in the "Edinburgh Review," "gave to a learned discussion the charms of an animated and interesting conversation," drew great numbers to the university, and made it for the time one of the most flourishing and popular in the kingdom. He was the author of "Origin of the Distinction of Ranks," (1771,) and a "Historical View of the English Government from the Settlement of the Saxons to the Accession of the House of Stuart," (1787.) The former was translated into French, German, and Italian. Died in 1801.

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen;" "Life of Millar," by CRAIG, prefixed to his "Origin of the Distinction of Ranks;" "Edinburgh Review" for October, 1806.

Mil'lard, (DAVID,) an American divine, born at Ballston, New York, in 1794, published several theological works, also "Travels in Egypt, Arabia, and the Holy Land," (1843.) Died at Jackson, Michigan, August 3, 1873.

Mil'ledge, (JOHN,) an American patriot and statesman, born at Savannah, Georgia, in 1757, distinguished himself in the war of the Revolution, and in 1802 was elected Governor of Georgia. He was one of the founders of the University of Georgia, and the former capital of the State was named in his honour. Died in 1818.

Milledoler, mil'dol'ar, (PHILIP,) D.D., an American divine, of the Dutch Reformed Church, born at Farmington, Connecticut, in 1775. He became president of Rutgers College, New Brunswick, in 1825. Died in 1852.

Mil'ler, (CHARLES HENRY,) an American artist, born in New York city, March 20, 1842. He studied art at the National Academy, New York, and at Munich. He first exhibited at the National Academy in 1860. He afterwards studied medicine, and graduated as M.D. in 1863 at the New York Homœopathic College, but he never practised that profession. In 1873 he became an associate, and in 1875 a full member, of the National Academy. Among his principal works are "The Challenge Accepted," (1860,) "A Cloudy Day in Spring," (1882,) "A Bouquet of Oaks," (1884,) "Niagara," "After the Storm," "Weir and Water-Gate," "The Wood-Gatherers," etc.

Mil'ler, (EDWARD,) an American physician, born in Delaware in 1760, was a brother of the Rev. Samuel Miller, noticed below. He became professor of the theory and practice of medicine in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, and wrote, among other works, a "Treatise on Yellow Fever," which is highly esteemed. He was one of the founders of the "Medical Repository," the first medical journal of America. Died in 1812.

Mil'ler, (EDWARD,) an English musician and writer, born at Norwich, was a pupil of Dr. Burney. He was the author of "Institutes of Music" and "Elements of Thorough Bass and Composition." Died in 1807.

Miller, me'yà', (EMANUEL,) a French scholar, born in Paris in 1812, has published a "Catalogue of the Greek Manuscripts in the Escurial," (1840,) and edited several classical works. [Died in 1886.]

Mil'ler, (HUGH,) an eminent Scottish geologist and writer, born at Cromarty on the 10th of October 1802, was a son of a mariner and shipmaster, who perished in a storm in 1807. He attended the grammar-school of the parish, and received instruction from two maternal uncles, James and Alexander Wright, one of whom encouraged his taste for natural history. At an early age he began to write verses. He learned the trade of a stone-mason, and commenced in 1819 his life of labour in a quarry of old red sandstone at Cromarty. "It was the necessity which made me a quarrier," he writes, "that taught me to be a geologist." He worked as a mason in various parts of Scotland, and diligently improved the intervals of labour by the cultivation of his mind. In 1825 and 1826 he was employed at Edinburgh as a stone-cutter. He afterwards published a volume of poems, and in 1834 relinquished his trade to become an accountant in a bank at Cromarty. In 1835 he produced "Scenes and Legends of the North of Scotland," which was received with favour. He married about 1836.

In 1839 he defended with much ability the cause of the Free Church, in a "Letter from One of the Scotch People to Lord Brougham," which was praised by Mr. Gladstone. He became in 1840 editor of the "Witness," an organ of the Free Church or Non-Intrusionists, published in Edinburgh twice a week. He continued to edit this paper until his death, and rendered it very popular and influential. His reputation as a geologist was increased by his work entitled "The Old Red Sandstone, or New Walks in an Old Field," (1841,) which is written in an attractive style. He afterwards published "Footprints of the Creator," (1849,) "First Impressions of England and its People," (1851,) an interesting autobiography entitled "My Schools and Schoolmasters, or the Story of my Education," (1854,) and "The Cruise of the Betsey." These works mark an important epoch in the progress of geology. "There was nothing in Miller's works," says the "Edinburgh Review" for July, 1858, "which so much surprised the public as their mere literary merit. Where could this Cromarty mason have acquired his style?"

In consequence of excessive mental exertion, his brain became diseased. During a paroxysm of insanity, he killed himself with a pistol in December, 1856. He had just finished a work entitled "The Testimony of the Rocks, or Geology in its Bearings on the Two Theologies, Natural and Revealed," (1857.) In this work he rejects the theory that the Mosaic account of the creation is purely parable, while he censures those who refuse to accept the evidences of scientific truths when they seem to clash with traditionary interpretations of Scripture. His "Footprints of the Creator" was written to refute the theory of development advocated by the author of "The Vestiges of Creation." "Hugh Miller," says the "Edinburgh Review," "must undoubtedly be regarded as one of the most remarkable men whom Scotland has produced. . . . The interest of his narrative, the purity of his style, his inexhaustible faculty of happy and ingenious illustration, his high imaginative power, and that light of genius which it is so difficult to define yet so impossible to mistake, all promise to secure for the author of the 'Old Red Sandstone' the lasting admiration of his countrymen."

See the "Edinburgh Review" for July, 1858, article "Hugh Miller," (reprinted in the "Living Age," August 21, 1858;) "North British Review" for August, 1854; "North American Review" for October, 1851; ALLIBONE, "Dictionary of Authors."

Miller, (JAMES,) an American officer, born at Peterborough, New Hampshire, about 1776. He served as colonel with distinction at the battles of Chippewa and Lundy's Lane, July 25, 1814. His commander asked him if he could take a certain battery at Lundy's Lane. He answered, "I'll try, sir," and captured the battery. Died in 1851.

Miller, (JOAQUIN,) the literary name of CINCINNATUS HEINE MILLER, an American poet, born at Cincinnati, Ohio, November 10, 1842. He went with his father's family westward when very young, and in 1852 reached Lane county, Oregon. In 1856 he began a roving life, and served for a time with Walker in Honduras. In 1860 he began to practise law in Oregon. In 1863 a newspaper which he edited was suppressed for disloyalty. He was county judge for Grant county, Oregon, 1866–70. Among his poems are "Songs of the Sierras," "Songs of the Sunlands," "The Ship in the Desert," "The First Fam'lies of the Sierras," etc. Later works of his (chiefly prose) are "The Danites," (an effective and successful play,) "My Life among the Modocs," "The Shadows of Shasta," "The One Fair Woman," "The Baroness of New York," "Memorie and Rime," etc.

Miller, (THOMAS,) an English poet and basket-maker, born at Gainsborough about 1808. He was patronized by the poet Rogers, by whose aid he became a bookseller. He wrote, besides numerous poems, the novels "Royston Gower" and "Fair Rosamond." Died in 1874.

Miller, (WILLIAM,) founder of the sect of the Millerites, was born at Pittsfield, Massachusetts, in 1781. About 1833 he began to prophesy the end of the world, which he affirmed would be destroyed in 1843. He died in 1849; and his followers, who are said to have numbered nearly fifty thousand, have since greatly decreased.

Miller, (WILLIAM,) an eminent line-engraver, born at Edinburgh, Scotland, May 28, 1796. He was a Quaker, and spent most of his life in his native town. His engravings after Turner are especially admirable. Died at Sheffield, England, January 20, 1882.

Miller, (WILLIAM,) "the Laureate of the Nursery," a Scottish poet, born in Glasgow in August, 1810. He was a wood-turner by trade, and his only published volume was "Scottish Nursery Songs, and other Poems," (1863.) Of his songs "Wee Willie Winkie" is perhaps the best-known. Died in Glasgow, August 20, 1872.

Miller, (WILLIAM ALLEN,) an English chemist and physician, born at Ipswich in 1817. He took his medical degree in London, and subsequently studied in the laboratory of Liebig at Giessen. He was appointed professor of chemistry in the Royal College in 1845, and assayer at the Mint and Bank of England in 1851. He was vice-president of the Royal Society and president of the Chemical Society, and wrote "Elements of Chemistry, Theoretical and Practical," (1850.) Died Sept. 30, 1870.

Miller, (WILLIAM HALLOWS,) F.R.S., an eminent English mineralogist and physicist, was educated at Saint John's College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of B.A. about 1826. He became professor of mineralogy at Cambridge in 1832, and wrote several treatises on crystallography. His most important work is a new and greatly-improved edition of Phillips's "Elementary Introduction to Mineralogy," (1852.) He was a member of a commission appointed by government in 1843 for the restoration of the standards of weight and measure, and he constructed and verified the new national standard of weight. Died May 20, 1880.

Milles, milz, (JEREMIAH,) an English divine and antiquary, born in 1714, became Dean of Exeter in 1762. He was a contributor to the "Archæologia," and made an unsuccessful attempt to vindicate the authenticity of Rowley's poems. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society, and president of the Society of Antiquaries. Died in 1784.

Millet, me'yȧ', (AIMÉ,) a French painter and sculptor, a son of Frédéric Millet, noticed below, was born in Paris about 1818; died January 14, 1891.

Mil'lẹt, (FRANCIS DAVIS,) an American painter, born at Mattapoisett, Massachusetts, November 3, 1846. He graduated at Harvard College in 1869, studied art at Antwerp in the Academy of Fine Arts, 1871–73, and was one of the jurors in the Vienna Exhibition of 1873, and at the Paris Exhibition of 1878, in which year he was war-correspondent of the "London Daily News" on the Balkan peninsula. He is an associate of the National Academy.

Millet, (FRÉDÉRIC,) a French portrait-painter, born at Charlieu in 1786, was a pupil of Isabey. He executed a number of portraits of great merit, among which we may name that of the empress Josephine. Died in 1859.

Millet, (JEAN FRANÇOIS,) commonly known as FRANCISQUE, an eminent painter, born at Antwerp, of French parentage, about 1644. He became a very skilful landscape-painter, and died in Paris in 1680. His son, of the same name, (born in Paris; died 1773,) was a clever artist, but inferior to his father.

Millet, (JEAN FRANÇOIS,) an eminent French painter, born at Gruchy, near Greville, (La Manche,) October 4, 1815. He studied under Delaroche, and then established himself at Barbison, an obscure hamlet, and became the faithful copyist of nature and of the humble life of peasants. Among his more noted paintings are "The Sowers," "The Sheep-Shearers," "Woman Carding Wool," "Sheep-Pasture by Moonlight," "The Potato-Planters," "The Evening Angelus," "A Woman Working Butter." His etchings and lithographs are few, and very costly. His pictures are now very highly esteemed. Died at Barbison, (which under his influence became an artist-colony,) January 20, 1875.

Millevoye, mēl'vwȧ', (CHARLES HUBERT,) a French poet and littérateur, born at Abbeville in 1782. He was the autnor of elegiac poems of great beauty, and obtained several prizes from the French Academy. Died in 1816.

Milli, mēl'lee, (GIANNINA,) a popular Italian poetess, born at Téramo in 1828. She very early attained an extensive fame as an improvvisatrice, travelling from city to city to exhibit her skill. In 1869 she became an inspectress of schools at Naples, and later was made principal of the girls' normal school at Rome. Some volumes of her verse have been published.

Mil'lĭ-kẹn, (RICHARD ALFRED,) an Irish poet, born in the county of Cork in 1767. He is only remembered for his humorous poem "The Groves of Blarney," which originated a form of verse afterwards cultivated successfully by Father Prout and others. Died in 1815.

Millin, me'yȧN',* (AUBIN LOUIS,) a French antiquary and naturalist, born in Paris in 1759. He published

* There seems to be some diversity respecting the pronunciation of these names: some speakers say me'lan', me'lon', etc., omitting all sound of the liquid l.

"Elements of Natural History," (1794,) "Dictionary of the Fine Arts," (3 vols., 1806,) "Mythological Gallery," (1811,) and other works. In 1795 he became editor of the "Magasin Encyclopédique," a journal of high character, which he conducted for twenty years. He was a member of the French Institute and of several foreign Academies, and a chevalier of the legion of honour. In 1794 he had been appointed keeper of the medals and antiquities in the Royal Library. Died in 1818.

Millingen, mil'ling-gĕn, ? (JAMES,) an eminent antiquary, of Dutch extraction, born in London in 1774. He published "Remarks on the State of Learning and the Fine Arts in Great Britain," "Ancient Coins of Greek Cities and Kings," (1821,) and other similar works, which have a very high reputation. Died in 1845.

Millon, mē'yôn',* (CHARLES,) a French littérateur, born at Liege in 1754, wrote poems, histories, etc. Died in 1839.

Millon, (EUGÈNE,) a French chemist, born at Châlons-sur-Marne in 1812. He published, besides other chemical treatises, "Elements of Organic Chemistry, comprising the Applications of this Science to Vegetable Physiology," (2 vols., 1845–48.) Died December 14, 1865.

Millot, mē'yo',* (CLAUDE FRANÇOIS XAVIER,) a French historian, born in Franche-Comté in 1726. He was the author of "Elements of Universal History," "Political and Military Memoirs towards the History of Louis XIV.," etc., (6 vols., 1777,) and other works of the kind. He was elected to the French Academy in 1777, and in 1778 was appointed preceptor to the Duc d'Enghien. Died in 1785.

Mills, (CHARLES,) an English writer, born at Greenwich in 1788, was the author of a "History of Mohammedanism," (1812,) "History of the Crusades," (1820,) "Travels of Theodore Ducas," etc., (1822,) and other works. Died in 1825.

Mills, (CLARK,) a distinguished American sculptor, born in Onondaga county, New York, in 1815. Having removed to Charleston, South Carolina, he executed several busts in marble, which won for him a high reputation. In 1848 he began his bronze equestrian statue of Jackson, for which, owing to its size, he was obliged to construct a foundry. It was completed in 1853, and placed in Lafayette Square at Washington. His next work was the colossal equestrian statue of Washington, finished in 1860. Died January 12, 1883.

See TUCKERMAN, "Book of the Artists."

Mills, (SAMUEL JOHN,) an American Congregational divine, born at Torringford, Connecticut, in 1783, was one of the founders of the American Missionary Society. He also took a prominent part in the organization of the American Colonization Society, and in 1817 visited Africa, in company with the Rev. E. Burgess, for the purpose of choosing a site for the colony. He died in 1818, while on his voyage home.

Mil'man, (Sir FRANCIS,) an eminent English physician, born in Devonshire in 1746. He published "Animadversions on the Nature and Cure of Dropsy," (1776,) "Treatise on the Source of the Scurvy," and other works. He was appointed physician to George III., and was a Fellow of the Royal Society and of the College of Physicians. Died in 1821.

Milman, (Rev. HENRY HART,) an English poet, historian, and divine, son of the preceding, was born in London in 1791. He graduated at Brasenose College, Oxford, where in 1821 he became professor of poetry. Having filled several inferior offices in the Church, he was appointed Dean of Saint Paul's in 1849. His tragedy of "Fazio," published in 1815, was well received, and was followed by the poems of "Samor, Lord of the Bright City," (1818,) "The Fall of Jerusalem," (1820,) "The Martyr of Antioch," and others. In 1840 he brought out his "History of Christianity from the Birth of Christ to the Extinction of Paganism in the Roman Empire," (3 vols. 8vo,) and in 1854 his "History of Latin Christianity, including that of the Popes to the Pontificate of Nicholas V." He published excellent editions of the works of Horace, with a well-written life of the poet, and of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." Died in September, 1868.

Mil'more, (MARTIN,) an Irish-American sculptor, born in the county of Sligo, Ireland, September 14, 1844. He settled with his family in Boston, Massachusetts, in 1851, and became a pupil of Thomas Ball. His portrait-busts are especially praised. Died at Boston, July 11, 1883.

Milne, miln, (COLIN,) a Scottish divine and naturalist, born at Aberdeen. He was the author of a "Botanical Dictionary," "Indigenous Botany," etc. Died in 1815.

Milne, miln, (JOSHUA,) an English writer, born in 1776, was appointed actuary of the Sun Life Assurance Office. He published a valuable "Treatise on Annuities," in which he describes a new system of notation for the calculation of life-insurance.

Milne, (WILLIAM,) D.D., a Scottish missionary, born at Kinnethmont, Aberdeenshire, in 1785. He was ordained in 1812, and went as an agent of the London Missionary Society to labour among the Chinese at Malacca, where he died in 1822.

Milne-Edwards, mĭln ĕd'wardz, [Fr. pron. mĕln à'doo-ärs',] (HENRI,) an eminent French naturalist, of English descent, born at Bruges in 1800. After he had taught natural history for some years in the Collége Henri IV. in Paris, he was elected to the Academy of Sciences in 1838. He published "The Natural History of the Crustacea," (3 vols., 1834–41,) which is highly esteemed. In 1841 he obtained the chair of entomology in the Jardin des Plantes, and in 1844 was chosen adjunct professor of zoology and comparative physiology at the Faculty of Sciences. He succeeded I. Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire as professor of zoology in 1862. Among his works are "Elements of Zoology," (4 vols., 1834–37,) which obtained considerable popularity, and "Researches into the Anatomy and Physiology of Polypi," (1842.) Died in 1885.

Mil'nęr, (ISAAC,) an eminent English divine and mathematician, born near Leeds in 1751. He studied at Queen's College, Cambridge, where he became in 1783 Jacksonian professor of experimental philosophy. He was subsequently appointed master of his college, (1788,) Dean of Carlisle, (1791,) and Lucasian professor of mathematics, (1798.) He was also twice elected vice-chancellor of his college. He was the author of a number of sermons and miscellaneous essays, and wrote a continuation of his brother Joseph's "Church History." He numbered among his friends Pitt and Wilberforce. Died in 1820.

Milner, (JOHN,) a learned Roman Catholic divine, born in London in 1752. He was the author of a "History, Civil and Ecclesiastical, and Survey of the Antiquities, of Winchester," and was a contributor to the "Archæologia." He was a member of the Society of Antiquaries. Died in 1826.

See the "London Quarterly Review" for May, 1810, and October, 1811.

Milner, (JOHN,) an English theologian, born near Halifax in 1628, became canon of Ripon. Died in 1702.

Milner, (JOSEPH,) an English divine, born near Leeds in 1744, was a brother of Isaac, noticed above. He became vicar of the Church of the Holy Trinity at Hull in 1797. He wrote a "History of the Church of Christ," (5 vols., 1794–1812,) which is esteemed a standard work. It was completed by his brother, the Dean of Carlisle. Milner also published an "Answer to Gibbon's Attack on Christianity," and other works. Died in 1797.

Mī'lo, [Gr. Μίλων; Fr. MILON, me'lôN',] an athlete, celebrated for his prodigious strength, born at Crotona, in Italy, was a pupil of Pythagoras. He is said to have once carried a bull on his shoulders to the sacrifice, and killed it with a blow of his fist. In 509 B.C. he gained a signal victory over the Sybarites. When advanced in years, he found one day, in passing through a forest, a tree partly cleft by wedges. Having introduced his hands for the purpose of severing it entirely, the wedges fell out, but, his strength failing him, the parts closed again, retaining him a prisoner, and in this helpless condition he was devoured by wild beasts.

Mī'lo, (TITUS ANNIUS,) a famous Roman tribune, was a plebeian, and a man of unscrupulous character. He became tribune of the people in 57 B.C., and was a partisan of Pompey. By his efforts to restore Cicero from exile he incurred the hostility of Clodius, with whom he fought in several bloody affrays. In the year 53 Milo was a candidate for the consulship. Before the electoral contest was decided, Milo and Clodius met, each with a band of armed slaves, and a fight ensued, in which Clodius was killed. Milo was tried for homicide, and, though defended by Cicero, was condemned, and exiled himself to Marseilles. Having taken arms against Cæsar in the civil war, he was killed in Lucania, 48 B.C.

Mil'roy, (ROBERT H.,) an American general, born in Indiana about 1814. He was appointed a brigadier-general of Union volunteers about September, 1861, and served at Cross Keys, June 8, 1862. He commanded about 8000 men at Winchester, was attacked June 15, 1863, and retreated, but lost nearly half of his force.

Miltiade. See MILTIADES.

Mil-tī'ą-dēs, [Gr. Μιλτιάδης; Fr. MILTIADE, mêl'-te'ăd',] a celebrated Athenian general, who flourished about 500 B.C., was the son of Cimon. He became successor to his uncle Miltiades, who had made himself a despot or master of the Chersonese in Thrace, and he appears first in history as an arbitrary ruler. Darius of Persia having sent a great armament, under Datis and Artaphernes, to conquer Greece, Miltiades was chosen one of the ten generals of the Athenian army, which awaited the enemy at Marathon in 490 B.C. The Grecian army numbered about 10,000 men, and the Persian probably over 100,000. A regulation then prevailed that each of the ten generals should command by turns for one day. Some of them were averse to risking a battle. When the command devolved on Miltiades, he gained one of the most memorable and important victories recorded in history. To reward his patriotism and eminent services to national liberty, the Athenians decreed that he should have the foremost place in a painting which illustrated the battle. Having failed in an attack on Paros, he was fined fifty talents, which he could not pay, and about the year 489 died in prison of a wound received in the action just named. The famous general Cimon was his son.

Miltitz, von, fon mil'tits, (KARL,) a German prelate, born about 1490, became chamberlain to Leo X., who sent him in 1518 as nuncio to Germany, in order to conciliate Luther or counteract his influence. On this occasion he displayed much tact, and used flattery or persuasive means with some success. (See LUTHER.) Died in 1529.

Miltitz, von, (KARL BORROMÄUS ALEXANDER STEPHAN,) a German poet and musical composer, born at Dresden in 1781. Among his best compositions are the operas of "Saul" and "Georg Czerny." Died in 1845. His brother ALEXANDER was ambassador to Constantinople, and wrote a valuable work entitled "The Manual of Consuls." Died in 1843.

Mil'ton, [Lat. MILTO'NUS; It. MIL'TON or MILTONO, mêl-to'no,] (JOHN,) an immortal poet, and, if we except Shakspeare, the most illustrious name in English literature, was born in Bread Street, London, on the 9th of December, 1608. He was the eldest son of John Milton, a scrivener, and Sarah Bradshaw, (or Caston, according to some authorities.) His early education was directed by a private tutor,—Thomas Young, a zealous Puritan. A portrait of his beautiful features, taken by C. Jansen, at the age of ten, has been preserved. Before he entered college he was an excellent Latin scholar. In severe and systematic study he laid the foundations of his fame. In a letter to a friend, written some years later, he says, "It is my way to suffer no impediment, no love of ease, no avocation whatever, to chill the ardour, to break the continuity, or to divert the completion of my literary pursuits." His first English poems were versions of the 114th and 136th Psalms, (1623.)

In February, 1624, he was admitted as pensioner into Christ's College, Cambridge, where he acquired distinction as a Latin poet. Dr. Johnson expresses the opinion that Milton "was the first Englishman who, after the revival of letters, wrote Latin verses with classic elegance." He took the degree of Bachelor in 1628, and that of Master of Arts in 1632,—before which he had been subjected to a temporary rustication (and, some say, to corporal chastisement) for an unknown offence. "By the intention of my parents," says Milton himself, "I was destined of a child to the service of the Church, and in my own resolutions. Till coming to some maturity of years, and perceiving what tyranny had invaded the Church, that he who would take orders must subscribe SLAVE, and take an oath withal, . . . I thought better to prefer a blameless silence, before the sacred office of speaking, bought and begun with servitude and forswearing."

In 1632 he left the university, and retired to his father's house at Horton, Buckinghamshire, where he remained five years, during which he is said to have read all the Greek and Latin writers. He also took lessons in music, which he loved, and in which he was very skilful. In this studious retirement, it appears, he wrote his beautiful poems "Comus," "L'Allegro," "Il Penseroso," and "Lycidas," (1637.) "Comus"—a drama in form, but essentially lyrical—was written and performed at Ludlow Castle in 1634, but not printed until 1637. "It is certainly," says Macaulay, "the noblest performance of the kind which exists in any language." "Lycidas" is contemptuously depreciated by Johnson as a "pastoral, easy, vulgar, and therefore disgusting."

But Hallam approves the judgment of a certain critic (whom he does not name) that "Lycidas" is "a good test of a real feeling for what is peculiarly called poetry." Milton's "Allegro" and "Penseroso" are universally admired. "It is impossible to conceive," says Macaulay, "that the mechanism of language can be brought to a more exquisite degree of perfection. These poems differ from others as ottar of roses differs from ordinary rose-water."

In 1638, attended by a servant, he visited Florence, Rome, and Naples, conversed with Galileo, then a "prisoner to the Inquisition," and received testimonials of honour and friendship from Carlo Dati, Francini, and Manso. He was admired as a great prodigy by these Italian celebrities. He returned in 1639, and opened in London a small boarding-school, in which he adopted a new system of education. His nephews, Edward and John Philips, were among his pupils. In 1641 he produced his first prose work,—a "Treatise of Reformation,"—which was followed by other arguments against the Established Church and Prelacy. He sympathized with the popular party in the great crisis of English liberty, but took no active part in the civil war which began in 1642.

At Whitsuntide, 1643, he married Mary Powell, whose father was a justice of the peace and a royalist of Oxfordshire. "The lady," says Dr. Johnson, "seems not much to have delighted in the pleasures of spare diet and hard study." A month after the marriage, she made a visit to her father's house, from which she refused to return. Having resolved to repudiate her, Milton published "The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce," (1644,) and other treatises on that topic, in his own justification. He also paid his addresses to a Miss Davis, until his wife implored forgiveness and was restored to favour. She became the mother of three daughters, who were all the children that Milton had.

He published in 1644 his "Areopagitica," or "Plea for Unlicensed Printing,"—probably his greatest prose work. "Many passages in this famous tract," says Hallam, "are admirably eloquent: an intense love of liberty and truth glows through it." He had taken a larger house in Barbican (about 1645) for the reception of scholars; but his wife's relations, to whom, when ruined by the civil war, he generously gave refuge, occupied his rooms. In March, 1648–49, he was appointed Latin secretary to the council of state, which was the highest executive power in the new republic. As an antidote to the "Eikon Basilike," i.e. the "Image (or Portrait) of the King,"—a work designed to excite commiseration for the sufferings of Charles I., (see GAUDEN,)—Milton produced his "Iconoclastes," (Eikonoklastes,) or "Image-breaker," and, by order of the council, appeared as the antagonist of the learned Salmasius, in reply to whom he wrote, in Latin, his celebrated work entitled "Defence of the English People," ("Defensio Populi Anglicani," 1650.) (See SALMASIUS.)

About 1654 he became totally blind. His "Defensio Secunda" (1654) contains an eloquent allusion to this privation. His wife died about 1653, and in 1656 he married Catherine Woodcock, who died in the following year. After serving the Protector Oliver as Latin secretary for four or five years, he retired about 1657 from public life, with a pension of £150. Before that date he had meditated the plan of a great epic poem. One of the subjects that presented was the exploits of King Arthur. After much deliberation, "long choosing and beginning late," he preferred the subject of "Paradise Lost," which at first he proposed to dramatize. At the restoration, (1660,) his prosecution was ordered, and he concealed himself in the house of a friend until the Act of Oblivion released him from danger. He married his third wife, Elizabeth Minshul, in 1664; and when the great plague raged in London, (1665,) he retired to Chalfont, Bucks, where his friend Ellwood had engaged a cottage for him. (See ELLWOOD, THOMAS.) In the course of the same year Milton showed to Ellwood the finished manuscript of "Paradise Lost," which the latter took home and perused. On returning it to the author, he remarked, "Thou hast said much here of Paradise Lost; but what hast thou to say of Paradise found?" Milton sold his copy in April, 1667, to Samuel Simmons, for an immediate payment of five pounds and the promise of an equal sum after the sale of thirteen hundred copies. It was rather coldly received, only three thousand having been sold in the first eleven years. "Its admirers," says Johnson, "did not dare to publish their opinion."

He published in 1671 "Samson Agonistes," a tragedy, and "Paradise Regained," which he is said to have esteemed his most perfect production; but the public and the critics have not sanctioned this preference. Milton died in London, by "a silent expiration," on the 8th of November, 1674.

A manuscript of Milton's "On Christian Doctrine," ("De Doctrina Christiana,") found in the State-Paper Office, London, in 1823, was translated and published in 1825. The genuineness of this work, though sometimes called in question, is considered by the great majority of critics to be established beyond reasonable doubt.

Milton was not connected with any church, but appears to have favoured the Independents,—a politico-religious party. "He grew old without any visible worship," says Johnson; who adds, "His studies and meditations were an habitual prayer." His favourite authors among the Greeks were Homer and Euripides, and Shakspeare and Spenser among the English. His stature was rather below the middle height. In his youth he was so eminently and delicately beautiful as to be called "the Lady" of his college, though his habits were far from effeminate. He had a fair complexion and auburn hair. Portraits of him were taken at the ages of ten, twenty-one, and about sixty.

"Considered with respect to design," says Johnson, "'Paradise Lost' may claim the first place, and, with respect to performance, the second, among the productions of the human mind. . . . His [Milton's] great works were performed under discountenance and in blindness; but difficulties vanished at his touch: he was born for whatever is arduous; and his work is not the greatest of heroic poems, only because it is not the first." "Was there ever anything so delightful," says Cowper, "as the music of 'Paradise Lost'? It is like that of a fine organ,—has the fullest and the deepest tones of majesty, with all the softness and elegance of the Dorian flute; variety without end, and never equalled, unless, perhaps, by Virgil." Of Milton's prose writings, Macaulay observes, "They are a perfect field of cloth of gold. The style is stiff with gorgeous embroidery."

"It is certain," says Hume, "that this author, when in a happy mood and employed on a noble subject, is the most wonderfully sublime of any poet in any language, Homer and Lucretius and Tasso not excepted. More concise than Homer, more simple than Tasso, more nervous than Lucretius, had he lived in a later age and learned to polish some rudeness in his verses, had he enjoyed better fortune and possessed leisure to watch the returns of genius in himself, he had attained the pinnacle of perfection and borne away the palm of epic poetry."

"It may be doubted," says Walter S. Landor, "whether the Creator ever created one altogether so great as Milton,—taking into one view at once his manly virtues, his superhuman genius, his zeal for truth, for true piety, true freedom, his eloquence in displaying it, his contempt of personal power, his glory and exultation in his country's."

"Milton," says Macaulay, "did not strictly belong to any of the classes which we have described. He was not a Puritan. He was not a Freethinker. He was not a Cavalier. In his character the noblest qualities of every party were combined in harmonious union. . . . We are not much in the habit of idolizing either the living or the dead. But there are a few characters which have stood the closest scrutiny and the severest tests, which have been tried in the furnace and have proved pure, which have been declared sterling by the general consent of mankind, and which are visibly stamped with the image and superscription of the Most High. These great men we trust we know how to prize; and of these was Milton. . . . His thoughts are powerful not only to delight, but to elevate and purify. Nor do we envy the man who can study either the life or the writings of the great poet and patriot without aspiring to emulate, not indeed the sublime works with which his genius has enriched our literature, but the zeal with which he laboured for the public good, the fortitude with which he endured every private calamity, the lofty disdain with which he looked down on temptation and dangers, the deadly hatred which he bore to bigots and tyrants, and the faith which he so sternly kept with his country and with his fame." ("Essay on Milton.")

Those who desire to know how this great poet is regarded by a nation whose taste and habits of thought differ most widely from those of the English, may consult the article "Milton" in the "Biographie Universelle," from the pen of the justly-celebrated French critic Villemain. He admits that Milton's picture of our first parents in Eden surpasses, in graceful and touching simplicity, anything to be found in the creations of any other poet, ancient or modern, and that the human imagination has produced nothing more grand or more sublime than some portions of "Paradise Lost."

Mil'ton, (JOHN,) an English musician and composer, the father of the poet. He was of an ancient Catholic family, and was disinherited for embracing Protestantism. Some of his tunes are contained in Ravenscroft's "Whole Book of Psalms," "The Triumphs of Oriana," and other contemporary publications. Died at an advanced age about 1646.

Milton, LORD. See FLETCHER, (ANDREW.)

Milutinovics or Milutinowitsch, pronounced alike me-loo-tee'no-vitch, (SIMON,) a Servian poet, born in 1791. He was the author of "Popular Songs of the Montenegrins," etc., "History of Servia from 1813 to 1815," and other works. Died in 1847.

Mī'mas, [Gr. Μίμας,] a giant said to have been destroyed by Jupiter. The island of Prochyte, near Sicily, was believed to rest upon his body.

Mim-ner'mus, [Gr. Μίμνερμος; Fr. MIMNERME, mĕm'nȧrm',] a Greek elegiac and lyric poet, born at Colophon about 630 B.C., was contemporary with Solon. The fragments of his poems have been published in the collections of Estienne, Brunck, and Boissonade; and, in a separate edition by Bach, Mimnermus is said to have invented the pentameter verse.

Mina, mee'nȧ, (Don FRANCISCO Espoz y—ês-pŏth'e,) a celebrated Spanish general, sometimes called EL REY DE NAVARRA, ("the King of Navarre,") born near Pampeluna in 1782. As a guerilla chieftain, he successfully defended Navarre against the French in 1808 and the succeeding campaigns. Having been created marechal del campo in 1813, he endeavoured to excite an insurrection against the government of Ferdinand VII., but, failing in the attempt, took refuge in France. After his return to Spain, in 1820, he became captain-general of the armies of Navarre, Galicia, and Catalonia. He held several high offices under Queen Christina, for whom he fought against Don Carlos. Died in 1836.

Mina, (XAVIER,) a Spanish officer, born in Navarre in 1789, was a nephew of the preceding. He undertook to liberate Mexico, which he entered in April, 1817, with a few hundred men. He gained several victories, but was captured and shot at Mexico in November, 1817.

Miñano y Bedoya, de, dȧ mĕn-yȧ'no e bȧ-do'e-ȧ, (SEBASTIAN,) a Spanish writer, born in the province of Palencia in 1779. He wrote "Letters from a Resident of Madrid," and a "History of the Spanish Revolution from 1820 to 1823," (in French.)

Mind, mĭnt, (GOTTFRIED,) a celebrated Swiss painter, born at Berne in 1768, was surnamed THE RAPHAEL OF CATS. He was the child of indigent parents, and a crétin, and was educated at Pestalozzi's institution for poor boys. His favourite subjects were cats and bears, which he delineated with unequalled skill and fidelity. He died in 1814, leaving numerous designs, which were sold at a high price.

Minderer, mĭn'dĕh-rĕr, (RAIMOND,) a German physician, born at Augsburg about 1570, was the discoverer of a new chemical compound, (acetate of ammonia,) since called Spiritus Mindereri. He published several medical works in Latin, and became physician to the emperor Matthias. Died in 1621.

Minderhout, mĭn'dĕr-hŏwt', a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1577, excelled in marine views, seaports, etc. Died in 1663.

Minelli, me-nel'lee, [Lat. MINEL'LIUS,] (JAN,) a Dutch scholar, born at Rotterdam about 1625. He translated Terence into Dutch, and published numerous editions of the Latin classics, with notes, which had a high reputation at the time. Died in 1683.

Minellius. See MINELLI.

Mi'nẽr, (ALONZO AMES,) D.D., LL.D., an American clergyman, born at Lempster, New Hampshire, August 17, 1814, became pastor of a Universalist church in Massachusetts in 1839, and in 1842 accepted a pastorate in Boston. He was president of Tufts College, 1862–75, and has long been conspicuous in educational, temperance, and other reforms. Among his works are "Bible Exercises" and "Old Forts Taken," (1878.)

Mī'nẽr, (THOMAS,) an American physician, born at Middletown, Connecticut, in 1777. He wrote, conjointly with Dr. Tully, "Essays on Fevers and other Subjects," (1823.) Died in 1841.

Mī-ner'vạ or A-the'nạ, [Fr. MINERVE, me'nȧrv',] one of the greater divinities of the Roman mythology, corresponding nearly to the Greek Athena or Athene, [Gr. Ἀθήνη or Ἀθηνᾶ.] She was regarded as the goddess of wisdom, arts, and sciences, or a personification of the thinking, inventive faculty. According to a popular tradition, she was the offspring of the brain of Jupiter, from which she issued in full armour. She was always represented as a virgin. In war she was contradistinguished from Mars (the god of brute force) as the patroness of scientific warfare, and hence, according to the ancient poets, was always superior to him. The favourite plant of Minerva was the olive, and the animals consecrated to her were the owl and the serpent. Athena was the great national divinity of Attica and Athens, to which she is said to have given her name. Pope, in his "Temple of Fame," alludes to her twofold character as the patroness of arts and arms, where he says,

"There Cæsar, graced with both Minervas, shone."

In the Trojan war she fought for the Greeks. She was sometimes called Pallas, Parthenos, (i.e. "virgin,") Tritonia or Tritogeneia, and other names. The poets feigned that Neptune and Minerva disputed for the possession of Attica, which the gods promised to him or her who should produce the most useful gift to mankind. Neptune, striking the earth with his trident, produced a war-horse, and Minerva produced the olive, (the symbol of peace,) by which she gained the victory. She was usually represented with a helmet on her head, holding in one hand a spear and in the other an ægis, or shield, in the centre of which was the head of Medusa. There was a celebrated statue of Minerva, called Palladium, which was said to have fallen from the sky, and on which the safety of Troy depended.

Minga, del, dĕl mĕn'gȧ, (ANDREA,) an Italian painter, of the Florentine school, lived about 1550–70.

Mingarelli, mĕn-gȧ-rel'lee, (GIOVANNI LUIGI,) an Italian ecclesiastic and writer, born near Bologna in 1722, was a friend of Tiraboschi. Died in 1793.

See CAVALIERI, "Vita di Mingarelli," 1817.

Minghetti, mĕn-gĕt'tee, (MARCO,) an Italian statesman, born at Bologna, September 8, 1818. He had already obtained fame as a journalist and political economist, when in 1848 he was called to Rome, and became for a time minister of public instruction, but soon went north and joined the Sardinian army. He held various cabinet positions in the new kingdom of Italy, acting for several terms as prime minister, and wielding a great influence as an orator and writer. His principal work is "Della Economía pubblica," (1859.) Other works of his are "Opusculi letterari ed economici," (1872,) "Le Donne italiane nelle belle Arti," (1877,) and "La Chiesa e lo Stato," (1878.) Died December 10, 1886.

Mingotti, mĕn-got'tee, (CATERINA,) an Italian vocalist, of German extraction, born at Naples in 1728. She studied under Porpora, and performed with brilliant success in the principal cities of Europe. Died in 1807.

Mingotti, mĕn-got'tee, (REGINA,) an Italian singer, born at Naples, of German parents, in 1728. Her family name was VALENTINI. When a mere child she married an impresario named Mingotti, who recognized her vocal abilities and had her educated for the operatic stage. She made her first appearance in Dresden, and soon won a great reputation, which was extended by her tours in Spain, Italy, and England. Died in 1807.

Miniana, me-ne-ā'nā, (JOSÉ MANUEL,) a Spanish historian, born at Valencia in 1671. He wrote a continuation of Mariana's "History of Spain," (1733.) Died in 1730.

Minié, me'ne-ā', (CLAUDE ÉTIENNE,) a French officer, born in Paris in 1810, was the inventor of the rifle called by his name. He was appointed by Napoleon III. superintendent of the school of ordnance at Vincennes, and received from him the sum of 20,000 francs. The Minié rifle was an immense improvement on anything of the kind that had previously been invented, both as regards precision and the extent of its range. Died December 14, 1879.

Minion and Minjon. See MIGNON.

Mino da Fiesole, mee'no dā fe-ĕs'o-lā, an eminent Italian sculptor, born at Fiesole about 1430. Among his works is a tomb of Paul II. at Rome. Died in 1486.

Mī'nos, [Gr. Μίνως,] a celebrated king and lawgiver of Crete, whose history is much obscured or embellished with fable. According to Homer, he was a son of Jupiter and Europa, a brother of Rhadamanthus, and the father of Ariadne and Deucalion. He was renowned for his justice and moderation, and it was fabled that after his death he became a judge of the souls which entered the infernal regions. He has by some writers been identified with Manu, (or Menu,) the great Hindoo lawgiver.

Minos, a king and lawgiver of Crete, supposed to have been a grandson of the preceding, with whom, however, he has been confounded by some writers. He was the husband of Pasiphaë, and had many children. He is said to have been the first Greek prince that had an important naval power. The Cretans ascribed to Minos their laws and political institutions, which served as a model for the legislation of Lycurgus. According to one tradition, he was cruel and tyrannical, and compelled the Athenians, whom he vanquished, to pay him an annual tribute in the form of boys and virgins, who were devoured by the Minotaur.

Mi'not, (GEORGE RICHARDS,) an American jurist and historian, born at Boston in 1758. His principal works are a "Eulogy on Washington," "History of Shays's Rebellion," and "History of Massachusetts Bay." Died in Boston, January 2, 1802.

Min'ọt, ? (LAWRENCE,) an English poet, whose works were discovered by Tyrwhitt while he was preparing an edition of Chaucer. He lived about 1330–50.

Min'o-taur, [Gr. Μινώταυρος; Lat. MINOTAU'RUS; Fr. MINOTAURE, me'no'tōR',] a monster of classic mythology, represented as half man and half bull. According to the legend, he was the offspring of Pasiphaë and a bull which was sent to Minos by Neptune; he was kept in the great labyrinth of Crete, was fed with youths and maidens whom the Athenians sent to Minos as tribute, and was finally killed by Theseus.

Min'tha or Men'tha, [Gr. Μίνθη,] a nymph, fabled to have been beloved by Pluto and changed by Ceres into the plant known as mint.

Minto, LORD. See ELLIOT.

Min'to, (WALTER,) a Scottish mathematician, born in Edinburgh, emigrated to America in 1786. He was the author of several scientific works, and became professor of mathematics at Princeton College, New Jersey. Died in 1796.

Mintrop, mĭn'trop, (THEODOR,) a distinguished German painter and designer, born at Heithausen, in Bavaria, in 1814. He produced designs in crayon, and several oil-paintings of religious subjects. Among his works are "The Riches of the Year," and "The Apotheosis of Bacchus." Died July 4, 1870.

Minturni, mĕn-toor'nee, (ANTONIO SEBASTIANO,) an Italian poet and canonist, born in Terra di Lavoro, was noted for his learning. Died in 1574.

Minut, de, dẹh me'nü', (GABRIEL,) a French littérateur, born at Toulouse about 1520. He was patronized by Catherine de Médicis, and was a friend of J. C. Scaliger. He published treatises on medicine, theology, and other subjects. Died in 1587.

Minutianus, me-nu-she-a'nus, [It. MINUZIANO, me noot-se-ā'no,] (ALESSANDRO,) a learned Italian printer, born at San Severo about 1450. He published the first complete edition of Cicero, and issued from his press numerous classics of great beauty and accuracy. Died about 1525.

Minutius or Minucius (mĭ-nu'she-us) Fe'lix, an early Christian writer, supposed to have been a native of Africa, lived in the third century. He was the author of a work entitled "Octavius," written in defence of Christianity. A good edition of it was published by Gronovius in 1707.

See BOUCHARD, "Dissertatio de Minutio Felice," 1685; HEINRICH MEIER, "Commentatio de Minucio Felice," 1823.

Minutoli, me-noo'to-lee, (HEINRICH MENU,) BARON, a distinguished writer, of Italian extraction, born at Geneva in 1772. He served in the Prussian army, and attained the rank of lieutenant-general. In 1820 he accompanied the scientific expedition sent by the Prussian government to Egypt, and published, (in German,) after his return, a "Journey to the Temple of Jupiter Ammon and Upper Egypt," (2 vols., 1824.) Among his other works is "Recollections of a Soldier." He was a member of the Academy of Sciences of Berlin, and was appointed by the king, Frederick William, tutor to Prince Charles. Died in 1846.

Minutoli, (JULIUS,) a lawyer, son of the preceding, was born at Berlin in 1805. He was appointed in 1851 consul-general for Spain and Portugal. He published a work entitled "Spain and its Progressive Development." Died November 5, 1860.

Min'ỹ-as, [Gr. Μινύας,] a fabulous personage, said to be a son of Neptune, a king of Bœotia, and the ancestor of the MINYÆ, (Μινύαι,) a race of heroes celebrated in the most ancient epic poetry of Greece. The Argonauts were mostly descendants of Minyas, and were called Minyæ.

Minzocchi, mĕn-zok'kee, or Menzocchi, mĕn-zok'kee, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian painter, born at Forlì about 1500, was a pupil of Genga. Among his master-pieces we may name "The Sacrifice of Melchisedec," "The Fall of Manna," and a "Holy Family." Died in 1574.

Minzoni, mĕn-zo'nee, (ONOFRIO,) an Italian poet and Jesuit, born at Ferrara in 1734, became professor of philosophy at Venice. He was the author of a collection of sonnets of great beauty. Died in 1817.

See TIPALDO, "Biografia degli Italiani illustri."

Miolan-Carvalho, me'o'lŏN' kăr'vă'lo', (CAROLINE

FÉLIX,) a French vocalist, born at Château-Roux in 1829. She performed with success in Paris and London as an operatic singer.

Miollis, me'o'lèss', (SEXTIUS ALEXANDRE FRANÇOIS,) COUNT, a French general, born at Aix in 1759. He was wounded at Yorktown, Virginia, in 1781. He became a general of division in 1799, and obtained command of all the French forces in Northern Italy in 1805. In 1809 he entered Rome, where, having expelled the pope, he remained, with the title of governor, until 1814. Died in 1828.

Mionnet, me'o'nȧ', (THÉODORE EDME,) a French antiquary, born in Paris in 1770. He wrote a "Descriptive Catalogue of Greek and Roman Medals," (7 vols., 1806–35,) a standard work, which still ranks among the best of its kind, a treatise "On the Rarity and Value of Roman Medals," etc., (2 vols., 1847,) and other similar works. Died in 1842.

Miot, me'o', (ANDRÉ FRANÇOIS,) Comte de Melito, a French statesman, born at Versailles in 1762. He was minister of the interior at Naples under Joseph Bonaparte. He died in 1841, leaving "Memoirs of the Consulate, the Empire, and King Joseph," (3 vols., 1858.)

Mirabaud, me'rȧ'bō', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French littérateur, born in Paris in 1675. He made a translation of Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," which had great popularity at the time. He also translated the "Orlando Furioso," and published several treatises on various subjects. The atheistical work entitled "Système de la Nature" was for a time attributed to Mirabaud, but is now known to have been written by Baron d'Holbach. Mirabaud was elected to the French Academy in 1726. Died in 1760.

See D'ALEMBERT, "Histoire des Membres de l'Académie Française."

Mirabeau, de, dẹh me'rȧ'bō', (BONIFACE RIQUETTI,) VICOMTE, a brother of Gabriel, noticed below, was born at Bignon in 1754. He served in the army of the United States about 1780. In 1789 he became a royalist member of the States-General, and was opposed to his brother in politics. He was so bloated by drinking that he was nicknamed "Barrel Mirabeau," ("Mirabeau Tonneau.") He was noted for his sarcastic wit. "In any other family," said he, "I should pass for a reprobate (mauvais sujet) and wit; but in mine I am regarded as a fool, but a sedate man." When his famous brother reproved him for his intemperance, he wittily replied, "Of all the vices of our family, that is the only one which you have left for me." He emigrated in 1790, and joined the royalist army on the Rhine. Died in 1792.

Mirabeau, de, dẹh me'rȧ'bō' or mîr'ạ-bō', (HONORÉ GABRIEL de Riquetti, (dẹh re'kȧ'te',) originally Arrighetti,) COMTE, a famous French orator and statesman, was born at Bignon, near Nemours, March 9, 1749. His family was of Italian extraction. He was the oldest surviving son of the Marquis de Mirabeau and Marie Geneviève de Vassan. The last representative of that stormy and highly-gifted race, he inherited a passionate nature, a frank and open temper, and a mind of great amplitude of grasp and prodigious activity. The education which he received under the strict discipline of his father was far from judicious. In his fifteenth year he was sent to a boarding-school in Paris, where he made rapid progress in ancient and modern languages and mathematics, also in music and the fine arts. In compliance with his father's will, he entered the army in 1767. The next year, by an amorous intrigue, he provoked the ire of the marquis, who caused him to be imprisoned in the Isle of Rhé. In 1769 he obtained liberty to serve in Corsica against Paoli, where he won golden opinions, and returned in 1770 with the brevet of captain. It puzzled his father to find a proper sphere for one whom he called a windmill, a whirlwind, one who "had swallowed all formulas." On one occasion he writes, "I pass my life in cramming him with principles."

In 1772 young Mirabeau married Marie Émilie de Covet, a daughter of the Marquis de Marignan, and became a resident of Aix. For running into debt, he was banished to Manosque, near the Alps, where he wrote an "Essay on Despotism." Having again displeased the grim marquis by some venial error, he was confined, by a lettre de cachet, in the castle of If, in 1774, and was finally separated from his wife, who was not inconsolable on that account. He was removed in 1775 to the castle of Joux; and, having liberty to walk out on parole, he formed an ardent attachment for Sophie Monnier, unhappily married to a man four times older than herself. With her he eloped in 1776, and went to Amsterdam, where he earned fair wages by translating Watson's "Philip II." and doing other literary jobs. The parliament of Besançon indicted him for abduction, and sentenced him to death. In May, 1777, the police-officers arrested him in Holland and consigned him to the prison of Vincennes, where he was kept forty-two months, apparently ruined, but still indomitable in spirit. Presenting himself before the court which had condemned him as contumacious, he pleaded his cause with such power that the sentence was annulled. He again met his father on amicable terms; for it is recorded among his few conventional virtues that he loved his father to the end. The marquis, however, left him to his own resources for a supply of money.

From about 1783 to 1788 he led a wandering life in England, France, and Germany, supporting himself by his wits, teeming with grand projects, and often engaging in questionable intrigues. Under the auspices of Franklin, he published an eloquent essay "On the Order of Cincinnatus," (1784,) which was followed by a tract "On the Opening of the Scheldt." A polemical tract on the water-company of Paris, in reply to Beaumarchais, produced a prodigious effect. In 1786 Calonne (partly from a desire to remove him out of the way) sent him on a secret mission to Berlin, where he met the Great Frederick, and collected materials for an important work,—"The Prussian Monarchy,"—which appeared in 1788. The States-General, which were convoked for May, 1789, offered to him a congenial arena for the exertion of his gigantic energies against the system of organized injustice and oppression which for ages had afflicted France. After he had been rejected with contempt by the noblesse of Provence, he was chosen triumphantly by the Tiers-État of Aix and Marseilles. He preferred to represent Aix. Aiming at reform by moderate means, he made overtures for co-operation with the ministry, but was coldly received by Necker, and went away in ill humour. On the 23d of June, 1789, he gave a decisive direction to the Revolution by his famous speech in reply to the king's usher, De Brézé, who reminded the Assembly that the king had ordered them to disperse:—"The Commons of France have resolved to deliberate. We have heard what the king has been advised to say; and you, who cannot act as his organ in the States-General,—you, who have here neither seat nor vote nor right of speech,—you are not the person to remind us of it. Go and tell your master that we are here by the will of the nation, and that nothing but the power of bayonets can drive us hence!" The usher quickly vanished, and Mirabeau became the master-spirit of the National Assembly. "Mirabeau's spiritual gift," says Carlyle, "will be found to be verily an honest and great one; far the strongest, best practical intellect of that time." His brief and pithy sentences became the watchwords of the Revolution; "his gestures were commands, his motions were coups d'état." Exchanging the rôle of tribune for that of a statesman, he soared above the intrigues of party and the ideal abstractions that were in vogue. "Where others grope darkly," says Lamartine, "he aims surely, he advances directly. . . . The philosophy of the eighteenth century, modified by prudence and policy, flows out all formulized from his lips. His eloquence, imperative as law, is only the gift of impassioned reasoning."

He advocated the abolition of the double aristocracy of lords and bishops, the spoliation of the Church, and the formation of the national guard, but he demanded for the king an absolute veto and the initiative in making war and peace. One of his greatest triumphs as an orator was won over Barnave, on the latter question, in 1790. Loud explosions of popular fury greeted him when it was known that he favoured the royal veto. As he entered the Assembly to speak on the question, he said to a friend, "I will either leave the House in triumph, or be torn to fragments." He gained his point, and restored his popularity. In the last part of his career he became more conservative, and formed a secret alliance with the court, from which he received large sums of money. He doubtless cherished an ambition to be prime minister of France.

In January, 1791, he was chosen president of the National Assembly. "Never had this office been so well filled," says Dumont. On parting with Dumont, who left Paris at the date just named, Mirabeau said, "I shall die at the stake, and we shall never, perhaps, meet again. That base faction whom I now overawe [the Jacobins] will again be let loose upon the country. I have none but direful anticipations." He died April 2, 1791. Among his last words were, "Envelop me with perfumes and crown me with flowers, that I may pass away into everlasting sleep." His strong constitution had been ruined by inordinate passions and immoral pleasures carried to the greatest excess, but veiled under a decorous exterior after he had attained eminence as a legislator. He had the art of enlisting men of talents in his service and appropriating their productions, on which he impressed the seal of his originality. Dumont, Clavière, and Duroverai were, perhaps, the chief persons who thus assisted him. Mirabeau had given development and outward form to the French Revolution; but to control it was beyond his power. His indomitable will might for a time direct or overawe the fury of the populace; but he possessed no virtues which could inspire the better portion of the people with that trust and confidence without which there can be no stability for any government.

Alluding to the resemblance between Mirabeau and Chatham, Macaulay observes, "Sudden bursts which seemed to be the effect of inspiration, short sentences which came like lightning, dazzling, burning, striking down everything before them, . . . in these chiefly lay the oratorical power both of Chatham and Mirabeau. . . . In true dignity of character, in private and public virtue, it may seem absurd to institute any comparison between them; but they had the same haughtiness and vehemence of temper. In their language and manner there was a disdainful self-confidence, an imperiousness before which all common minds quailed. . . . There have been far greater speakers and far greater statesmen than either of them; but we doubt whether any men have, in modern times, exercised such vast personal influence over stormy and divided assemblies." Mirabeau, de, (JEAN ANTOINE RIQUETTI,) MARQUIS, surnamed SILVERSTOCK, a brave French officer, born in Provence in 1666, was the grandfather of the great orator Mirabeau. His ancestors, the Arrighettis, were exiled from Florence in 1267. He was called "Vendôme's right arm." At the battle of Cassano, in 1706, where he commanded a regiment, he received twenty-seven wounds, one of which was in the neck. In consequence of this, he wore a silver stock to support his head. He married, and lived many years after that action.

See "Mémoires de Mirabeau;" CARLYLE, "Essays," vol. i.

Mirabeau, de, (VICTOR RIQUETTI,) MARQUIS, the self-styled "Friend of Men," born at Perthuis in 1715, was the son of the preceding, and father of the great orator. A proud, eccentric person, of violent passions and powerful intellect, he was regarded as the reverse of a "friend" by most men who had intercourse with him. His hobby was Political Economy, in which he was a disciple of Du Quesnay. He published on that science able and voluminous works, some of which were received with favour. His "Friend of Men," ("Ami des Hommes,") which appeared about 1755, made a great sensation, though its style was extremely rugged, quaint, and tortuous. He lived mostly in Paris, and was ambitious to direct affairs of state. It is reported that he obtained from the ministry no less than fifty-four lettres de cachet, arbitrary warrants to imprison his children and others. Died in 1789. "Out of all which circumstances," says Carlyle, "there has come forth this Marquis de Mirabeau, shaped into one of the most singular, sublime pedants that ever stepped the soil of France. There never entered the brain of Hogarth or of rare old Ben such a piece of humour as in this brave old Riquetti nature has presented us ready-made. For withal there is such genius in him, rich depth of character, indestructible cheerfulness and health breaking out in spite of these divorce-papers, like strong sunlight in thundery weather."

Mirabella, me-rȧ-bel′lȧ, (VINCENZO,) an Italian antiquary, born at Syracuse in 1570. He wrote a "History of Syracuse," and other works. Died in 1624.

Miraflores, de, dȧ me-rȧ-flō′rĕs, (MANUEL de Pando,) MARQUIS, a Spanish historian, born at Madrid, December 24, 1792. He was several times sent on important embassies, and was in later life prominent as one of the principal ministers of the government. His chief works relate to the history and politics of his own times. Died in Madrid, March 17, 1872.

Miramon, me-rȧ-mŏn′, (MIGUEL,) a Mexican general, born about 1832. He became the leader of the clerical party which began to wage war against Juarez in 1858. He was defeated in a decisive battle in December, 1860, and went into exile. He afterwards returned, and fought for Maximilian, and was executed with him in June, 1867.

Miranda, me-rȧn′dȧ, (FRANCISCO,) a South American patriot, born at Caraccas about 1750. Having entered the French army, he served in the American campaigns of 1779 and 1781, and in 1792 became general of division under Dumouriez. In the campaign of 1793 he was defeated by the allies at Neerwinden, and was brought to trial for mismanagement on this occasion, but he was acquitted. Being condemned by the Directory in 1797, he took refuge in England, and on his return to Paris, in 1803, was a second time banished. He sailed in 1806 to Venezuela, where he made an unsuccessful attempt to found a republic. He was arrested in 1812 by the Spanish government, and imprisoned at Cadiz, where he died in 1816.

Miranda, de, dȧ me-rȧn′dȧ, (Don JUAN GARCIA,) a Spanish artist, born at Madrid in 1677, became painter to the king, Philip V. Died in 1749. There were several other painters of the same family.

See CEAN-BERMUDEZ, "Diccionario Historico," etc.

Miranda, de, dȧ me-rȧn′dȧ, (SA,) one of the earliest Portuguese poets, born at Coimbra about 1495. He was one of the founders of Portuguese literature, and is said to have been the first to employ the metres of Dante and Petrarch. He was the author of sonnets and dramas, but his reputation rests chiefly on his poetical epistles and eclogues. Died in 1558.

Mirbel, de, dẹh mêr′bĕl′, (CHARLES FRANÇOIS BRISSEAU,) an eminent French botanist, born in Paris in 1776. He was appointed by the empress Josephine superintendent of the gardens of Malmaison in 1803, and in 1808 became a member of the Academy of Sciences, and adjunct professor of botany and vegetable physiology to the Faculty of Sciences. He afterwards held several public offices, and in 1828 was appointed professor of culture in the Jardin des Plantes. Among his principal works are "Elements of Botany and Vegetable Physiology," (3 vols., 1815,) and "Natural History of Vegetables," etc., (15 vols., 1826,) written in conjunction with Lamarck, also "Researches on the Marchantia Polymorpha," and other treatises of great value, contributed to the "Journal de Physique" and various other scientific periodicals. He likewise assisted Sonnini in his "Natural History of Plants." Mirbel gave great attention to structural botany, in which branch of the science he was really eminent, although his views have been to a great extent superseded. Died in 1854.

See PAYEN, "Éloge historique de M. de Mirbel," 1858; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Mirbel, de, (LIZINSKA AIMÉE ZOÉ RUE,) the wife of the preceding, was born at Cherbourg in 1796. She acquired a high reputation as a miniature-painter. Among her best works may be named the portraits of Louis Philippe, the Duke of Orléans, the Count of Paris, Madame Guizot, and Émile de Girardin. She obtained several medals, and was appointed after the restoration miniature-painter to the king. Madame Mirbel ranks as one of the best of modern miniaturists. Her portraits are remarkable for correctness and finish, as well as for vigour and spirited expression and for harmony of colour. Died August 31, 1849.

See "Journal des Beaux-Arts," 1849.

Mirecourt, de, dẹh mèr'koor', (EUGÈNE JACQUOT,) a French littérateur, born November 19, 1812. The latter part of his name was assumed from the name of his native village, Mirecourt, in the Vosges. He early adopted literature as a profession, and in 1845 attracted attention by an attack on Alexandre Dumas, entitled "The House of Alexandre Dumas & Co., Manufacturers of Novels." In 1854 he commenced the publication of a series of volumes under the general title of "Les Contemporains," which consisted of gossipy and semi-scandalous articles upon the literary celebrities of the hour. Many of these involved him in lawsuits. After one hundred volumes had been published, Mirecourt founded a weekly paper under the same title and with a similar aim. He also wrote a number of inferior romances. Died February 13, 1880.

Mirepoix, de, dẹh mèr'pwâ', (CHARLES PIERRE GASTON FRANÇOIS de Lévis—dẹh lâ've',) DUC, a French general, born in 1699. He became a marshal of France in 1757. Died in 1758.

Mirevelt. See MIEREVELT.

Mir Hasan, meer hâ'sạn, a poet of India, who lived at Fyzabad and Lucknow and died in 1786. He wrote (in the Urdu language) "The Magic of Eloquence," (a romance,) "The Rose-Garden of Iran," etc.

Mir'i-am, [Heb. מִרְיָם,] a prophetess, a sister of Moses, the Hebrew lawgiver. She sang a song of triumph after the children of Israel had passed through the Red Sea.

See Exodus xv. 20; Numbers xii.

Mirkhond, mir'kond', a celebrated Persian historian, born in 1433, was the author of a work entitled "Garden of Purity, or History of Prophets, Kings, and Caliphs." There are manuscripts of this history in the libraries of Paris, London, Berlin, and Vienna, and portions of it have been translated into French and several other languages. Died in 1498.

Mir Muhammadi Soz, meer mûh-hâm'mâ-dee sŏz, a Hindostanee poet, who lived at Lucknow, but became a dervish, and died in 1800. He wrote much elegant but licentious verse.

Miromesnil, de, dẹh me'ro'mạ'nèl', (ARMAND THOMAS HUE,) a French minister of state, born in the Orléannais in 1723. He was keeper of the seals from 1774 to 1787. Died in 1796.

Mir Taki, (or Taqi,) meer tâ'kee, a Hindostanee (Urdu) poet, born at Agra. He lived mostly at Lucknow, and died in 1810. Many critics give him the first place in Urdu poetry, but others consider him inferior to Sauda. He left a great number of poems.

Mirza. See MEERZÂ.

Mi-se'nus, [Gr. Μισηνός; Fr. MISÈNE, me'zạn',] a Trojan warrior, distinguished for his valour and his skill as a trumpeter, was called ÆOL'IDES by Virgil. After the capture of Troy, he went to Italy with Æneas, whom he served as a trumpeter. He is said to have been drowned by a Triton who was envious of his musical skill.

See VIRGIL'S "Æneid," book vi. 162–174.

Misri-Effendi, mis'ree ẽf-fẽn'dee, a Turkish poet and enthusiast, born in Egypt about 1660. He celebrated in verse the incarnation of Jesus Christ. Died in 1710.

Missiessy, me'se'ạ'se', (ÉDOUARD THOMAS BURGUES,) a French admiral, born in Provence in 1754. He commanded a squadron which, in May, 1805, was sent to the Antilles, and in 1809 commanded the naval forces at Antwerp. Died in 1832.

Misson, me'sŏn', (FRANÇOIS MAXIMILIEN,) a French writer, born at Lyons, was of a Protestant family, and settled in England after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Having visited Italy in 1687, he published, after his return, an account of his travels, which was commended by Addison for its lively and faithful descriptions. Died in 1721.

Mistral, mès'trâl', (FREDERI, or FRÉDÉRIC,) a French (Provençal) poet, born at Maillane, September 8, 1830. His most noted work is the pastoral epic "Mirèio," (1859; in English by H. Crichton, 1868, and by H. W. Preston, 1872,) which was the basis of Gounod's opera "Mireille," (1864.) He also wrote "Calendau, Pouémo nouveau," (1867,) and "Lis Isclo d'Or," ("The Golden Shoes," 1875.) Mistral is one of the principal members of the group of writers called felibres, (who aim at a restoration of Provençal literature,) and prepared a Provençal Dictionary.

Mitch'ẹl, (JOHN,) an Irish adventurer, born in the county of Derry in 1815. He was for a time associate editor of the Dublin "Nation," and subsequently of "The United Irishman," which, however, was soon suppressed by the British government, and Mitchel was sentenced to fourteen years' banishment to Australia in 1848. In 1854 he escaped to the United States, and became an editor successively of "The Southern Citizen" and "The Richmond Examiner," violent pro-slavery and secession journals. In 1874 he returned to Ireland and was elected to Parliament, but before taking his seat he died, March 19, 1875.

Mitchel, (ORMSBY MACKNIGHT,) an eminent American astronomer, born in Union county, Kentucky, in 1810. Having graduated at West Point in 1829, he became in 1834 professor of mathematics, philosophy, and astronomy at Cincinnati College, Ohio. He first suggested the erection of an observatory at Cincinnati, and the successful accomplishment of the enterprise was chiefly due to his efforts; and the institution, of which he became director, was provided through his exertions with one of the finest telescopes to be found in the United States. He delivered popular lectures on astronomy at various places, and published, besides other works, "Planetary and Stellar Worlds," which was very favourably received. In 1859 he became director of the Dudley Observatory at Albany. He was appointed a brigadier-general in the Union army in August, 1861. He moved with a small army from Tennessee to Alabama in April, 1862, surprised Huntsville, and distinguished himself by his energy. Having been promoted to the rank of major-general, he was appointed commander of the department of the South, about August, 1862. He died of yellow fever at Beaufort, South Carolina, in October of that year.

Mitch'ell, (Sir ANDREW,) a distinguished diplomatist, born in Edinburgh about 1695, was elected to Parliament in 1747, and in 1751 was appointed resident minister at Brussels. He was ambassador-extraordinary to Berlin in 1753, and acquired considerable influence over Frederick the Great, whom he succeeded in detaching from the interests of France. Died in 1771.

See "Memoirs and Papers of Sir Andrew Mitchell," by A. BISSETT, 1850; THIÉBAULT, "Souvenirs de vingt Ans de Séjour à Berlin."

Mitchell, (ANDREW,) a Scottish naval officer, born about 1757, attained the rank of vice-admiral of the white in 1799, and in 1802 was appointed commander-in-chief on the coast of America. Died in 1806.

Mitchell, (Sir DAVID,) a naval commander under the reign of William III., rose to be rear-admiral of the blue in 1693. He was afterwards employed in important missions to Russia and Holland. Died in 1710.

Mitch'ell, (DONALD GRANT,) a distinguished American writer, born at Norwich, Connecticut, in 1822.

Having graduated at Yale College in 1841, he made the tour of Europe, and published after his return, under the pseudonym of IK MARVEL, "Fresh Gleanings; or, A New Sheaf from the Old Fields of Continental Europe," (1847.) His principal works are "Reveries of a Bachelor," (1850,) "Dream Life," (1851,) "The Judge's Doings," (1854,) "My Farm of Edgewood," (1863,) "Wet Days at Edgewood," (1864,) "Seven Stories, with Basement and Attic," (1864,) "Dr. Johns," (1866,) "Rural Studies," (1867,) "Pictures of Edgewood," (1869,) and "About Old Story-Tellers," (1878.) He was appointed in 1853 United States consul at Venice.

Mitchell, (ELISHA,) D.D., an American chemist and divine, born in Litchfield county, Connecticut, in 1793, became professor of mathematics in the University of North Carolina in 1817, and subsequently of chemistry in the same institution. Being appointed State surveyor, he first discovered the fact that the mountains of North Carolina are the highest in the United States east of the Rocky Mountains. While exploring one of these heights, in 1857, he was killed by a fall from a precipice. His name has been given to one of the highest summits.

Mitchell, (JOHN KEARSLEY,) M.D., an American physician, born in Jefferson county, Virginia, in 1796. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1841 became professor of the theory and practice of medicine in Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia. He published a treatise "On the Cryptogamous Origin of Malarious and Epidemic Fevers," (1849,) and lectures on scientific subjects, which are highly esteemed and have been translated into foreign languages. Died in 1858.

Mitchell, (JOSEPH,) a Scottish poet and dramatist, born about 1685, was the author of a tragedy entitled "The Fatal Extravagance," "The Highland Fair," a ballad opera, and a number of poems. Died in 1738.

Mitchell, (MARIA,) LL.D., a distinguished American astronomer, born in the island of Nantucket in 1818. She published, besides other astronomical treatises, a memoir on a telescopic comet discovered by her in 1847. A gold medal was conferred upon her by the King of Denmark for this discovery. Miss Mitchell was appointed professor of astronomy at Vassar College soon after the opening of that institution in 1865, a position which she held until 1888. Died June 28, 1889.

See MRS. HALE, "Woman's Record of Distinguished Women."

Mitchell, (ROBERT B.,) an American general, born in Ohio about 1825. He became a brigadier-general of the Union army about April, 1862, and commanded a division at Perryville, October 8 of that year. Died 1882.

Mitchell, (S. WEIR,) M.D., an American physician and physiologist, a son of Dr. J. K. Mitchell, noticed above, was born in Philadelphia, February 15, 1829. He graduated at the Jefferson Medical College in 1850. He has particularly distinguished himself by his researches on the chemical nature and physiological action of the venom of serpents. Among his numerous contributions to medical science we may name "Researches upon the Venom of the Rattlesnake," etc., published among the Smithsonian Contributions, (1860,) "Experiments and Observations upon the Circulation in the Chelonura Serpentina," (Snapping-Turtle,) etc., published among the Memoirs of the American Philosophical Society, 1862, and "Researches on the Physiology of the Cerebellum," (see the "American Journal of Medical Sciences" for April, 1869.) He has also published (with Drs. Keen and Morehouse) an excellent work on the "Effects of Gunshot Wounds and other Injuries of the Nerves," (1864.) Dr. Mitchell is a member of the National Academy of Sciences of the United States of America, and of numerous other scientific institutions.

Mitchell, (THOMAS,) an eminent English scholar, born in London in 1783. He studied at Pembroke College, Cambridge, and in 1813 began the publication of a series of essays on Aristophanes and Athenian manners, in the "Quarterly Review," which won for him a high reputation. He afterwards published an excellent translation of several comedies of Aristophanes into English verse; also an edition of Sophocles, and five dramas of Aristophanes, (with English notes.) He died in 1845, leaving unfinished an edition of his "Pentalogia Aristophanica."

Mitchell, (Sir THOMAS LIVINGSTONE,) a Scottish traveller, born in Stirlingshire in 1792. He served in the Spanish campaigns from 1808 to 1814, and in 1827 sailed to Australia, where he was soon after appointed surveyor-general. He gave the name of Australia Felix to a region hitherto unexplored, and ascertained the courses of the Glenelg, the Darling, and other rivers. He published, among other works, "Outlines of a System of Surveying for Geographical and Military Purposes," (1827,) "Three Expeditions into the Interior of Eastern Australia," etc., (2 vols., 1838,) and "Australian Geography," etc., (1850.) He was a Fellow of the Royal Society and of the Geographical Society. Died in 1855.

Mitchell, (WALTER,) an American divine and littérateur, born at Nantucket, Massachusetts, in 1826. He is the author of "Bryan Maurice," a novel, and of several poems. Among the latter is the often-quoted "Tacking Ship off Shore."

Mitch'ill, (SAMUEL LATHAM,) M.D., LL.D., an American physician and naturalist, born on Long Island in 1764. In 1786 he graduated as doctor of medicine at the University of Edinburgh. He became in 1792 professor of chemistry, natural history, and philosophy in Columbia College, New York. He was for many years associate editor of the "Medical Repository." He was elected to the United States Senate in 1804, and in 1820 was appointed professor of botany and materia medica in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York. He published "Observations on the Absorbent Tubes of Animal Bodies," and other scientific works. Died in 1831.

Mitelli, me-tel'lee, or Metelli, mā-tel'lee, (AGOSTINO,) an Italian painter and engraver of great merit, born near Bologna in 1609, was a pupil of Dentone and Falcetta. His principal works are perspective and architectural pieces, in which his friend Michael Angelo Colonna painted the figures. Among their masterpieces are the frescos in the palace of Cardinal Spada at Rome. Mitelli died in 1660, at Madrid, whither he had been invited by Philip IV.

See LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy."

Mitelli, (GIUSEPPE MARIA,) an Italian painter and engraver, born in 1634, was a son of the preceding. His prints after Correggio and the Caracci are ranked among his best works. Died in 1718.

Mit'ford, (JOHN,) an English writer and journalist, was editor of the "Bon-Ton Magazine," "Quizzical Gazette," and other periodicals of the kind. He was the author of a naval romance entitled "Johnny Newcome in the Navy," and several popular ballads. Died in 1831.

See TIMPERLEY, "Encyclopædia of Literary Anecdote."

Mitford, (JOHN FREEMAN,) an English statesman and jurist, born in 1748, was a brother of the historian, noticed below. He studied at New College, Oxford, and, having been admitted to the bar, was elected to Parliament for Beer-Alston in 1789. He became attorney-general in 1799, Speaker of the House of Commons in 1801, and in 1802 lord chancellor of Ireland, being created at the same time a peer, with the title of Baron Redesdale. On the death of Mr. Pitt he resigned his office of chancellor. Died in 1830.

Mitford, (MARY RUSSELL,) a charming English writer, born in Hampshire in 1786. Her father was a physician of more than ordinary talent and culture, whose improvidence, however, and luxurious tastes had involved him in pecuniary embarrassment. In order to relieve his necessities, Miss Mitford devoted herself to authorship at an early age, and published in 1806 three volumes of poems, which met with severe criticism from some of the leading journals. Her next publications were the tragedies of "Julian," (1823,) "The Foscari," (1826,) "Rienzi," (1828,) and "Charles I.," several of which were favourably received. She had previously contributed to the "Ladies' Magazine" a series of sketches of English life, which appeared in 1832 under the title of "Our Village," etc., (5 vols.) The genial spirit, graceful simplicity, and freshness of feeling displayed in these tales won for them the favour of all classes, and they passed rapidly through many editions. Among Miss Mitford's other works we may name "Belford Regis; or, Sketches of a Country Town," "Stories of American Life by American Writers," "Recollections of a Literary Life," (3 vols., 1852,) and "Atherton, and other Tales," (1854.) Died in 1855.

See the "Life of Mary Russell Mitford, told by herself in Letters to her Friends," edited by the REV. A. G. K. L'ESTRANGE, London, 1870; "Quarterly Review" for December, 1824; "Blackwood's Magazine" for June, 1854.

Mitford, (WILLIAM,) an English historian, born in London in 1744. He entered Queen's College, Oxford, and subsequently studied law at the Middle Temple. He was appointed in 1769 a captain in the South Hampshire Militia, where he acquired the friendship of Gibbon, the future historian, at that time an officer in the same regiment. Mitford published in 1774 his "Inquiry into the Principles of Harmony in Languages," which was followed by a "Treatise on the Military Force," etc. Having visited France and Italy, he was appointed, after his return, lieutenant-colonel of the Hampshire Militia, (1779,) and was subsequently returned to Parliament, as a Tory, for Newport, Beer-Alston, and New Romney. He brought out in 1784 the first volume of his "History of Greece," completed in five volumes in 1818. Its style is characterized by great spirit and warmth of colouring, and displays uncommon learning and research, but it is strongly tinctured with the anti-democratic prejudices of the author. Died in 1827.

"The Athenian democracy," says an able critic in the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale," "is treated by him with extreme injustice. Scarcely anything can be imagined more partial or more false than his picture of the great conflict between Athens and Philip of Macedon. Philip, as he represents him, unites the perfections of a king, a hero, and an accomplished statesman; Demosthenes, on the contrary, is a demagogue, violent, venal, and dishonest." "Mitford's History of Greece is," says De Quincey, "as nearly perfect in its injustice as human infirmity will allow."

See MACAULAY, Review of "Mitford's History of Greece;" "Edinburgh Review" for July, 1808; "Quarterly Review" for April, 1821; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Mĭth'ra or Mĭth'ras, [Gr. Mίθρας; Lat. MITH'RAS; Sanscrit, MĬT'RA or MĬTRAS,] a deity of the ancient Persians, usually regarded as the god of the sun; but he is more properly the god of day, and, in a higher and more extended sense, the god of light, presiding over the movements and influence of the principal heavenly bodies, including the five planets and the sun and moon. By the followers of Zoroaster he was regarded as the chief of the Izeds, (a class of angelic beings,) and in a particular manner as presiding over the light which mortals enjoy on earth, (but as distinct from the sun,) and as a mediator between men and Ormuzd. The primary signification of the Sanscrit Mitra is a "friend;" and Mithra would seem to be the representative of light as the friend of mankind and as the mediator between earth and heaven. In this character of mediator, as well as in some other respects, he would seem to approach the character of AGNI, (which see.) In the time of the emperors the worship of Mithra was introduced extensively into Italy and other parts of the Roman empire. He is usually represented as a handsome young man, seated or kneeling on a bull, into which he is thrusting the sacrificial knife; at his side are the evening and morning star, and near at hand a dog, a lion, and other animals, the signification of which is at present very imperfectly understood.

Mithridate. See MITHRIDATES.

Mith-rĭ-dā'tēs, [Gr. Μιθριδάτης or Μιθραδάτης; Fr. MITHRIDATE, me'tre'dăt',] a Persian name, borne by several kings of Pontus, who were descended from Artabazes, a Persian noble. It is supposed to be derived from Mithra, (the sun,) and signifies "given by the sun." Little is known of Mithridates I., who was the son of Ariobarzanes.

Mithridates II., the son of Ariobarzanes II., began to reign about 337 B.C. He extended his dominions by conquest, and was called the founder of the kingdom of Pontus. In a war with Antigonus he was defeated, made prisoner, and put to death, about 303 B.C.

Mithridates III., a son of the preceding, succeeded his father, and made conquests in Paphlagonia. He died after a reign of thirty-six years, and was succeeded by his son, Ariobarzanes III.

See CLINTON, "Fasti Hellenici."

Mithridates IV., of Pontus, the son of Ariobarzanes III., began to reign probably about 245 B.C., when he was a minor. He waged a successful war against Seleucus Callinicus, who, to obtain peace, gave him his own sister in marriage, with one or two provinces as a dowry. He is supposed to have died in 190 B.C. His successor was Pharnaces I.

Mithridates V., surnamed EVERGETES, was a grandson of the preceding, and a son of Pharnaces I., whom he succeeded in 156 B.C. He was a steadfast ally of the Romans, who ceded to him the province of Phrygia. After a peaceful reign, he died about 122 B.C.

Mithridates VI., King of Pontus, surnamed EU'PATOR, and more commonly called THE GREAT, born about 135 B.C., was the son of Mithridates V., whom he succeeded about the age of fifteen. He had great political and military talents, and is said to have been master of twenty-five languages. In the early part of his reign he found scope for his ambition in the conquest of Colchis and of the Scythian tribes which roamed on the north of the Euxine. His attempt to acquire Cappadocia by fraud and force was resisted by the Roman senate about 93 B.C. After forming an alliance with Tigranes, King of Armenia,—then the most powerful monarch of Asia,—he took the field in the year 88 with about 250,000 men, and defeated the Romans in several actions. In the same year he instigated a general massacre of the Romans resident in Asia Minor, of whom it was computed that 80,000 fell in one day.

In the year 87 he sent a large army into Greece, where he was opposed by Sulla and defeated at Chæronea, 86 B.C. Timbria, with another Roman army, invaded Bithynia and gained a decisive victory in the year 85. The next year Sulla and Mithridates made a treaty of peace, by which the latter abandoned his recent conquests. Muræna, who had obtained command of the Roman army, with some flimsy pretext renewed hostilities, and was completely defeated on the river Halys in 82 B.C. As the Roman senate had not ratified the treaty which he signed with Sulla, Mithridates made great preparations for war, which was renewed in 74, when two Roman armies, under Lucullus and Cotta, entered Bithynia. Defeated with great loss by Lucullus at Cyzicus and Cabiri, Mithridates, retarding the pursuit of the Romans by the riches he threw in their way, took refuge in the kingdom of Tigranes (who was his son-in-law) about 72 B.C., and gave orders that his wives Monima, Berenice, etc. should be put to death.

Tigranes, having espoused his cause, was defeated at Tigranocerta by Lucullus in 69, and at Artaxata in 68 B.C. Mithridates then entered Pontus, and in 67 B.C. gained a great victory over the Romans under Triarius, and recovered his kingdom. Lucullus, whose victorious career had been interrupted by a mutiny of his troops, was superseded in 66 by Pompey the Great, who soon terminated the war. After losing a battle, the King of Pontus fled to Lake Mæotis, (now the Sea of Azov,) and offered terms of peace, to which Pompey did not accede. While he was busy in raising a new army among the Scythians and other barbarous tribes, his son Pharnaces conspired against him, so that, to avoid the fate of a captive, he took poison, in the year 63 B.C. After Hannibal, Mithridates was the most formidable enemy Rome ever encountered. Cicero considered him superior in power and character to any other king against whom the Romans ever waged war.

Mith-rĭ-dā'tis, [Gr. Μιθριδάτις,] a daughter of the preceding, died with her father by taking poison, B.C. 63.

Mitre, mē'trà, (BARTOLOMÉ,) an Argentine president, born at Buenos Ayres, June 26, 1821, was a journalist in Montevideo during the early part of the nine years' siege, in which he also bore arms; went to Bolivia in 1846, taught in a military college, and fought against Peru; became a journalist in Valparaiso, was colonel of artillery in the decisive campaign against the tyrant Rosas in 1852, and became a leader in the movement for the independence of the state of Buenos Ayres from the remaining states of the Argentine Confederation. He was successively minister of war and governor, was defeated by President Urquiza at Cepeda in 1859, but overthrew him at Pavon, September 11, 1861, and became first President of the reorganized Argentine Republic. He was commander-in-chief of the "triple alliance" against Paraguay, 1865–70. He was distinguished as a poet, journalist, and novelist, and was author of an "Historia de Belgrano."

Mitscherlich, mĭtsh'ẹr-lĭk', (CHRISTOPH WILHELM,) a distinguished German scholar, born in Thuringia in 1760, was professor of philosophy and rhetoric at Göttingen. He published in 1800 an excellent edition of the Odes and Epodes of Horace. Died in 1854.

Mitscherlich, (EILARD,) an eminent German chemist, born near Jever in 1794. He studied at Heidelberg and Göttingen, and in 1819 was invited to Stockholm by Berzelius, whose notice he had attracted by his valuable discoveries in isomorphism. After his return to Germany (1821) he became professor of chemistry at the University of Berlin, and a member of the Academy of Sciences in that city. He was chosen a member of the French Institute in 1852. He published a "Treatise on Chemistry," ("Lehrbuch der Chimie," 2 vols., 1829–40,) which has a very high reputation, and wrote contributions to Poggendorf's "Annalen" and to other journals. Died in 1863.

Mittarelli, mĕt-tà-rel'lee, (NICCOLÒ JACOPO, afterwards GIOVANNI BENEDETTO,) an Italian theologian, born in Venice in 1707. He wrote a "History of the Camaldules," ("Annales Camaldulenses," 9 vols., 1755–73,) a work of some merit. Died in 1777.

Mittermaier, mit'ẹr-mī'ẹr, (KARL JOSEPH ANTON,) a celebrated German statesman and jurist, born in Munich in 1787. He was successively professor of law at Bonn and Heidelberg, president of the preparatory parliament at Frankfort in 1848, and soon after member of the National Assembly. He published a number of valuable legal treatises, among which we may name "The Common Civil Process of Germany compared with that of Prussia and France," (1826.) Died August 29, 1867.

Mitzler (or Mizler) von Kolof, mĭts'lẹr fon ko'lof, (LORENZ CHRISTOPH,) a German writer on music, born in Anspach in 1711. He published a "Musical Library," ("Musikalische Bibliothek," 4 vols., 1736–54,) and other works. Died at Warsaw in 1778.

Miv'art, (SAINT GEORGE,) an English naturalist, born in London, November 30, 1827. He was educated at King's College, London, and Saint Mary's College, Oscott, and became a Roman Catholic in 1844. In 1851 he was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn. In 1874 he was made professor of biology in the (Catholic) University College at Kensington. Among his books are "Genesis of Species," (1871,) "Lessons in Elementary Anatomy," (1872,) "Man and Apes," (1873,) "Lessons from Nature," (1876,) "Contemporary Evolution," (1876,) "The Cat," (1881,) "Nature and Thought," (1883,) etc.

Mnioch, mnee'ok, (JOHANN JAKOB,) a Prussian poet, born at Elbing in 1765, wrote a number of popular lyrics, among which we may name "The Song of the Grave," and "Song of the Masons at Saint John's Festival." Died in 1804.

Mo'ab, [Heb. מוֹאָב,] the son of Lot, was the father of the Moabites, who inhabited the country east of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. (See Genesis xix.)

Moâweeyah, Moawiyah, or Moawyah, mo-ä'-wee'yah,* written also Muawia, Mauweiah, and Moâveah, [in German, MOAWIJAH, MUAWIJJAH, or MOAWIJE,] a celebrated caliph, born at Mecca in 610 A.D., was the founder of the Omeyyad dynasty. He was the great-grandson of Omeyyah, who was the head of a powerful family of the Koreish, and cousin-german to Abd-el-Mŏŏttalib, the grandfather of Mohammed. He subjected Arabia to his power about 660, and deposed Hassan, the son of Alee, (Aĭ.) He was an able and successful but unscrupulous ruler. He died in 680, and was succeeded by his son, Yezeed, (Yezĭd.) His grandson, MOÂWEEYAH II., born in 660, became caliph in 683. He abdicated in 683 or 684 A.D.

Mo'bẹr-lў, (GEORGE,) D.C.L., an English bishop, born at Saint Petersburg, Russia, in 1803. He was educated at Winchester, and graduated at Balliol College, Oxford, in 1825, becoming a tutor and Fellow of the same college. He was head-master of Winchester School, 1835–68, and in 1869 was consecrated Bishop of Salisbury. He published several volumes of sermons, and various educational and theological works, and was prominent as a High-Church prelate. Died in 1885.

Möbius or Moebius, mö'be-ûs, (AUGUST FERDINAND,) a German astronomer and mathematician, born at Schulpforte in 1790. In 1844 he was appointed professor of astronomy at Leipsic. He published, among other scientific treatises, "The Barycentric Calculus, a New Expedient for the Analytic Treatment of Geometry," (1827,) and "Manual of Statics." Died in 1868.

Mocchetti, mok-ket'tee, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian poet and physician, born at Como in 1766, published "Philosophical Odes." He became in 1815 physician to Caroline, Princess of Wales. Died in 1839.

Mocchi, mok'kee, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian sculptor, born near Florence in 1580; died in 1646.

Mocenigo, mo-chà-nee'go, (ALVISIO,) born in 1701, was elected Doge of Venice in 1763. He pursued a pacific policy. Died in 1778.

Mocenigo, (GIOVANNI,) brother of Pietro, noticed below, was born in 1408. He was elected Doge of Venice in 1478. The country being devastated by famine and the plague, and at the same time invaded by the Turks, he made peace in 1479 with the Sultan, Mahomet II. Died in 1485.

See MARINO SANUTO, "Vite de' Duchi di Venezia."

Mocenigo, (LUIGI I.,) succeeded Pietro Loredano as Doge of Venice in 1570. The most important events of his rule were the capture of the isle of Cyprus by the Turks, and the victory of Lepanto, gained by the Venetians and their allies under Don John of Austria, (1571.) Died in 1577.

See DARU, "Histoire de Venise."

Mocenigo, (LUIGI II.,) succeeded Valieri as doge in 1700. He governed with great wisdom and ability, and prevailed on the Venetians to keep a strict neutrality during the war of the Spanish succession. Died in 1709.

Mocenigo, (PIETRO,) became Doge of Venice in 1474, having previously greatly distinguished himself in the wars against the Turks. Died in 1476.

* There is a great diversity in the accentuation as well as in the spelling of this name. Hammer-Purgstall, than whom there is no higher authority, places the full accent on the penultima; and we have thought it safe to follow his example.

Mocenigo, (SEBASTIANO,) brother of Luigi II., succeeded Cornaro as Doge of Venice in 1722. Died in 1732.

See DARU, "Histoire de Venise."

Mocenigo, (TOMMASO,) an able Venetian statesman, born in 1343. He was elected doge in 1414. The Venetian fleet defeated that of the Sultan in 1416. During his administration the republic was prosperous and powerful. Died in 1423.

Mocetto, mo-chet'to, (GIROLAMO,) an Italian artist had a high reputation as an engraver. He lived about 1470–1500.

Mochnacki, moK-nät'skee, (MAURICE,) a Polish patriot and historian, born in Galicia in 1804. He became in 1825 associate editor of the "Warsaw Journal," and in 1830 published an excellent treatise "On the Polish Literature of the Nineteenth Century," which was instrumental in founding a new school of poetry in Poland. He was a prominent leader in the insurrection of 1830 against the Russian government. On the fall of Warsaw he took refuge in France, and began a "History of the Polish Revolution," which he did not live to complete. Died in 1834.

Mocquard, mo'kär', (CONSTANT,) a French politician and littérateur, born at Bordeaux in 1791. He practised law in his early life. During the reign of Louis Philippe he became a friend and adherent of Louis Napoleon, who in 1848 appointed him his private secretary. He performed an important part in the coup d'état of December, 1851, after which he was chef du cabinet of the emperor for many years. He published a collection of criminal trials, "Nouvelles Causes célèbres," (6 vols., 1847.) Died in 1864.

Mo-deer', [Sw. pron. mo-dïr',] (ADOLF,) a Swedish naturalist and economist, born in 1738, published several works. Died in 1799.

Modena, mod'à-nâ, (GUSTAVO,) a popular Italian writer and tragic actor, born at Venice in 1803. He made his début in 1826 at Rome. He became an orator of the radical party during the revolutionary movement of 1847, and published "Popular Dialogues," ("Dialoghetti popolari.") Died at Turin, February 22, 1861.

Modena, da, dâ mod'à-nâ, or Mutina, moo'te-nâ, (TOMMASO BARISINI,) an eminent Italian painter, supposed to have been born at Módena in the early part of the fourteenth century. Among his master-pieces we may name an altar-piece of the Virgin and Child.

Mo-des-ti'nus He-ren'nĭ-us, a Roman jurist of the third century, was one of the counsellors of the emperor Alexander Severus, and was appointed preceptor to Maximinus the Younger. He wrote a number of legal works, of which only fragments are extant.

Modi, mo'de, or Moði, written also Mode, [that is, "the Courageous," from a root cognate with the Danish mod and German muth, "courage,"] a son of Thor, destined to survive the destruction of the world at Ragnaröck. In the renovated world he will share with Magni the possession of their father's hammer, (mjölnir,) and direct their efforts towards putting an end to all strife.

Modigliano, mo-dël-yâ'no, (GIAN FRANCESCO,) an Italian painter, sometimes called FRANCESCO DA FORLÌ, born at Forlì about 1550. His works are principally historical pieces of a religious character, some of which have great merit.

Mo'dĭ-us, (FRANÇOIS,) a Flemish philologist and jurist, born near Bruges in 1536; died in 1597.

Mod-jes'ka, (HELENA,) a Polish actress, born at Cracow about 1843. She married M. Modjeska when she was seventeen years old. After his death in 1865 she married one Chlapowski, a journalist, and after her great success upon the Warsaw stage they removed to California, where she first appeared in an English-speaking part in 1877, since which time she has won many triumphs.

Moe, mō'ẹh, (JÖRGEN ENGEBRETSEN,) a Norwegian poet, born at Hole, in Sigdal, April 22, 1813. He was educated in the University of Christiania, and from 1845 to 1853 was professor of divinity in the national military school. In 1875 he was appointed Bishop of Christiansand. He published "Songs, Ballads, and Staves," (1840,) "Norske Folke-eventyr," (1841; prepared partly by Asbjörnsen, except in later editions,) "I Brönden og i Tjernet," (1851,) "En liden Julegave," ("A Little Christmas-Gift," 1859,) etc. Died at Christiansand, March 27, 1882.

Mof'fạt, (JAMES CLEMENT,) D.D., a Scottish-American clergyman, born at Glencree, in Galloway, May 30, 1811. He came to America in 1833, and graduated at Princeton College in 1835, and afterwards studied at Yale College. He was then for two years a tutor at Princeton, professor of Greek and Latin in Lafayette College, 1839–41, of Latin and history in Miami University, 1841–52, professor of Greek and Hebrew in Cincinnati, 1852–53, of Latin in Princeton, 1853–54, and of Greek, 1854–61, and professor of church history at Princeton after 1861. Among his works are "Introduction to the Study of Æsthetics," (1856,) "Life of Chalmers," "Comparative History of Religions," (1871,) "Summer Ramble in Scotland," (1873,) "Alwyn, a Poem," (1875,) "The Church in Scotland, a History," (1882,) "General Church History in Brief," (1884,) etc. Died in 1890.

Mof'fạt, (ROBERT,) a Scottish missionary, born near Edinburgh in 1795, set out for Africa about 1816. He spent more than twenty years in the southern part of that country, and about 1840 published "Missionary Labours and Scenes in Southern Africa." He also translated the New Testament and Psalms into the Bechuana tongue. Mr. Moffat was father-in-law of the African explorer, Dr. Livingstone. Died Aug. 10, 1883.

Mogilas, mo-hee'lâs, (PETROS,) a Russian prelate, of a Wallachian family, born about 1600. He studied in Paris, became a monk in 1625, and in 1632 was consecrated Metropolitan of Kieff. He prepared a "Catechism," (1645,) and the celebrated "Orthodox Confession" of 1640, adopted as a standard by the patriarchs and synods of the Greek Church. Died in 1647.

Mohallal, mo-hăl'lạl, (Ada-Ben-Rebiah,) an Arabian poet, born at Diarbekir, lived about 600 A.D. He first fixed the rules and metre of Arabian poetry. He was an uncle of the poet Amrool-Kais.

Mo-hăm'med or Ma-hom'et, written also Mohamed and Muhammed, [Arabic pron. mo-ham'med; Fr. MAHOMET, mä'o'mä'; Ger. MOHAMMED, mo-hâm'mĕt, or MUHAMMED, mōō-hâm'mĕt; It. MAOMETTO, mâ-o-met'to, or MACOMETTO, mâ-ko-met'to; Lat. MOHAM'MED or (rarely) MOHAM'MEDES, (gen. of both, MOHAMMEDIS,) or MUHAMMED; Port. MAFOMA, mâ-fo'mâ; Sp. MAHOMET, mâ-o-mĕt',] a celebrated religious teacher and pretended prophet, the founder of one of the most widely diffused religions of the globe, was born at Mecca about 570 A.D. The year of his birth is not positively ascertained; the authorities are divided between 571 and 569, but the former date appears to be generally regarded as the more probable one. Both his parents belonged to the Koreish, at that time the most influential of all the Arabian tribes. His father, Abdallah, who was of the family of Hâshem, was regarded as the handsomest youth of his time. He married A'mĭnah, of the noble family Zohrah. Their only child was Mohammed, the future prophet. Amĭnah possessed, it is said, a peculiarly nervous temperament, and used to fancy, while between sleeping and waking, that she was visited by spirits. It is probable that Mohammed inherited from his mother his constitutional tendency to epilepsy, as well as his most remarkable mental peculiarities. Many marvellous stories are told of the circumstances attending his birth. It is related, among other things, that his mother experienced none of the pangs of travail. As soon as her child was born, he raised his eyes to heaven, exclaiming, "There is no God but God, and I am his prophet!" That same night the fire of Zoroaster, which, guarded by the Magi, had burned uninterruptedly for more than a thousand years, was suddenly extinguished, and all the idols in the world fell down.†

* This name is often pronounced, especially by the poets, mah'ho-met' or mā'ho-met, an accentuation derived, in all probability, from the French. (See Introduction, page 13.) Mahom'et (with the accent on the penultima) is not only the prevailing English pronunciation, but it corresponds more nearly with the Arabic.

When his son was only two months old, Abdallah died; (according to some accounts, he died two months before the birth of Mohammed.) Amĭnah for a short time nursed her infant herself, but sorrow soon dried the fountains of her breast, and the young child was committed to the care of Halceemah, (Halĭmah,) a shepherd's wife, with whom he remained about five years. It is related that when Haleemah showed the child to a celebrated soothsayer, (Kâhin,) who was an idolater, the latter exclaimed, "Kill this child!" Haleemah snatched away her precious charge and fled. Afterwards the Kâhin explained to the excited multitude: "I swear by all the gods," said he, "that this child will kill those who belong to your faith; he will destroy your gods, and he will be victorious over you." When Mohammed was four years old, he was seized, while at play, with a nervous fit, which was supposed to be epilepsy. As this disease was ascribed to supernatural influence, his nurse was alarmed, and was anxious to return him to his mother; but she was at last prevailed on to keep him somewhat longer. When he had completed his sixth year, his mother died. For the next two years he lived with his grandfather, Abd-el-Mŏŏttalib, who appears to have regarded him with great fondness. At his death, Abd-el-Mŏŏttalib recommended the orphan to the care of his son, the noble-minded Aboo-Tâlib.

When only twelve years old, Mohammed accompanied his uncle on a trading expedition to Syria. Near Bostra they met with an Arabian monk named Baheerâ or Sergius. It is said that Aboo-Tâlib, for some reason not explained, found it necessary to send the young Mohammed home again, and that Sergius took charge of him and accompanied him to Mecca. Early Christian biographers assert that Mohammed received his revelations from this monk; and he himself tells us in the Koran that he was accused of having been taught by a foreigner. It is not improbable that on his different journeys to Syria he learned many facts respecting the religions of Western Asia; but how far the knowledge of such facts influenced his future career must ever remain a subject of conjecture.

When Mohammed was twenty-five years of age, his uncle, Aboo-Tâlib, proposed to him that he should take charge of the merchandise which Khadîjah, (or Khadee'-jah,) a rich widow of Mecca, was about to send to the markets of Syria. He accepted the proposal, and appears to have fulfilled his charge with judgment and with entire fidelity. Khadîjah was so well pleased with him on his return that she offered him her hand. Although she was forty (lunar) years of age, and he but twenty-five, it was considered by the family of Mohammed as a very desirable connection. Their nuptials were celebrated with a magnificent feast and great rejoicings. This marriage raised Mohammed to an equal position with the wealthiest inhabitants of Mecca. His moral character, moreover, appears to have inspired universal esteem and confidence, and he was generally known by the surname of El-Ameen, (El-Amîn,) or "the Faithful." For several years after his marriage he continued his commercial journeys, visiting, with the caravans, the Arabian fairs and markets of Syria. But, being now above the necessity of anxiously toiling for a subsistence, he had leisure to give free scope to the natural tendency of his mind, which inclined him to religious meditation and speculation. "He had," says Carlyle, "no school learning; of the thing we call school learning, none at all. The art of writing was but just introduced into Arabia; it seems to be the true opinion that Mahomet never could write. Life in the desert, with its experiences, was all his education."

Until his fortieth year Mohammed appears to have been a devout worshipper of the gods of his fathers. About this time he began to entertain serious scruples respecting the worship of idols. His followers ascribe the change to a divine revelation; but others have suggested that his scruples were probably excited by a more extensive acquaintance with the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, which he may have acquired from his wife's cousin, War'ăkă, who had, it is said, once been a Jew and afterwards became a Christian, and who made withal some pretensions to astrology. Supposing these conjectures to have a basis of truth, it was perhaps fortunate for the new prophet's claims to an original revelation that Warăkă died a short time before Mohammed publicly proclaimed his divine mission. But, however his thoughts may have been first directed to the subject of religion, there is every reason to believe that he was, at least in the early part of his career, sincere and unselfish in his desire to convert his countrymen to a better faith. He appears to have thought long and deeply, and to have had many mental struggles, before he resolved to announce himself as a divine teacher. He was of a nervous and melancholic temperament, and there were times, during the period of doubt and conflict which preceded the annunciation of his great mission, when he was strongly tempted to commit suicide by throwing himself down from a precipice. (See Sprenger's "Life," p. 105.) In all his trials he found a great support in his faithful wife Khadîjah, who was the first, as he himself declared, among all his nation that believed in him. "God thus ordained it," says Ibn Ishâk, "that his duties might be made easy to him; for, as often as he had to hear reproachful language, or was accused of falsehood, or was cast down, she cheered him up and inspired him with courage, saying, 'Thou speakest the truth.'" We may well suppose, with Carlyle, that "of all the kindnesses she had done him, this of believing the earnest, struggling word which he now spoke was the greatest." For a considerable time Mohammed preached his new doctrines respecting the unity and glorious attributes of God to his household and intimate friends only. In three years he had made, we are told, only fourteen converts; but among these were the high-spirited, devoted, and indomitable Alee, (Alĭ,) who was afterwards surnamed the "ever-victorious Lion of God," (see ALEE,) and Aboo-Bekr, whose character for good sense, benevolence, and straightforward integrity contributed not a little to the respectability and ultimate success of the new religion.

In the fourth year of his mission, in obedience, as he alleges, to an express command from heaven, Mohammed resolved to make a public declaration of his faith. He addressed himself to the Koreish and others, asking them, "If I were to tell you that there is an army on the other side of that mountain, would you believe me?" "Yes," they answered, "for we do not consider thee to be a liar." He then said, "I come to warn you; and if you do not believe me, a great punishment will befall you;" he told them they must renounce idolatry, and make a profession of the one true God; that unless they did so they could have no true happiness in this life nor salvation in the life to come. He formally separated himself from the polytheists, and publicly condemned their religion. A powerful opposition was in consequence organized against him,—his uncle, Aboo-Lahab, (lâh'hab,) and Aboo-Sofiân, (of the family of Omeyyah,) the principal leader of the Koreishites, being among the number of his bitterest enemies. Not only the prophet himself, but his disciples were for a time in extreme danger; he owed his life to the influence of the powerful family of Hâshem, and especially to the magnanimity, courage, and indomitable firmness of his uncle, Aboo-Tâlib, who, although he refused to accept the new faith, resolved, at whatever cost, to protect his kinsman. Every form of persuasion and menace was tried upon him in vain. To the hostile Koreishites, who urged him to give up to their vengeance the blasphemer of his country's gods, he answered with indignant scorn, and declared that if they should slay his nephew the lives of the chiefs of their tribe should pay for the life of Mohammed. They were thunder-struck at his boldness and awed by his invincible determination. But, while they hesitated to provoke the vengeance of the Hâshemites by laying violent hands upon Mohammed, they persecuted his disciples in a hundred ways, insulting and imprisoning those of the better class, and starving and torturing such as had no wealth, position, or family connections to protect them. Under the pressure of this persecution many converts to the new faith apostatized; and Mohammed, fearing that others might desert him, advised some of his followers to leave Mecca and seek refuge in Abyssinia, which was ruled, he said, by a just and pious king. The subsequent conduct of the Abyssinian monarch proved that the confidence of the prophet was not misplaced.

In spite of all opposition, the new doctrines continued to spread. In the sixth year of Mohammed's mission two important conversions took place,—the prophet's kinsman Hamzah, surnamed, on account of his bravery, the "Lion of God," and Omăr, who had at first been a bitter opponent of the Islâm, but afterwards became one of its most zealous and powerful defenders. (See OMAR.)

Ten years after the commencement of his mission, (that is, about 619 A.D.,) Mohammed lost by death his generous and faithful wife, Khadîjah, and his noble-minded uncle and protector, Aboo-Tâlib. He appears to have been greatly cast down by these severe afflictions, and seldom went out of his house. Meanwhile, his enemies seemed to have become more exasperated than ever by the failure of all their efforts to prevent the spread of the new religion. In this extremity, his uncle, Aboo-Lahab, who had hitherto been one of his most determined and bitter opponents, but upon whom now devolved the duty of protecting his kinsman, came forward with singular magnanimity and said to Mohammed, "Go wheresoever thou wilt, and do what thou wast accustomed to do when Aboo-Tâlib was alive: I swear by the gods of my country that no harm shall befall thee while I live." But a few days afterwards some one said to Aboo-Lahab, "Do you know what your nephew says of your father? he says he is in hell." Aboo-Lahab asked Mohammed if the charge was true. The prophet had the hardihood to answer, "Your father died an idolater; and every idolater goes to hell." Upon this, Aboo-Lahab withdrew his protection.

So long as Khadîjah lived, Mohammed may be said to have been a strict monogamist. Shortly after her death the daughter of Hakeem and wife of Othmân asked the prophet why he did not marry. "Whom shall I marry?" said he. She replied, "If thou wishest a virgin, take Ayeshah, the daughter of Aboo-Bekr; if a widow, take Sawdah, the daughter of Zamah,—she believes in thee." He instantly replied, "I will marry them both."

After Mohammed was abandoned by Aboo-Lahab, another uncle, El-Abbâs, (the brother of Aboo-Tâlib, and ancestor of the Abbasside caliphs,) became his protector. Meanwhile the faith which had been rejected at Mecca was eagerly embraced in the neighbouring city of Medina. A numerous and powerful deputation from the most influential families of the latter city waited on the prophet, and in a solemn covenant promised, with an oath, that if he would come and live with them they would protect him as they would protect their own wives and children. The offer of this powerful aid did not come a moment too soon. His enemies, headed by Aboo-Sofiân, had been unremitting in their efforts to procure his destruction. At length it was formally and publicly resolved that he should be slain. In order to baffle the vengeance of the Hâshemites, and to divide the guilt of his death, it was agreed that one man from every family should at the same moment plunge his sword into the heart of their victim. Nothing now remained for him but death or instant flight. At the dead of night, accompanied by his faithful friend Aboo-Bekr, he silently escaped from his house. The generous and devoted Alee, covered with the shawl of the prophet, laid himself down on the bed of his master. Meanwhile Mohammed and Aboo-Bekr had fled to the cave of Thor, about a league from Mecca: there they remained three days. According to one account, their enemies, after exploring every hiding-place in the vicinity, came to the mouth of the cave. But, a spider having providentially spread her web over the entrance, the Koreishites, deeming it impossible that Mohammed could have entered there, turned back from their pursuit. Perhaps a more probable explanation is that as the Koreishites knew Medina to be the destination of the fugitives, they never suspected that they could be concealed in the cave of Thor, which lay in an opposite direction. While they were in the cave, Aboo-Bekr, contrasting their weakness with the strength of their enemies, said, trembling, "We are but two." "No," replied Mohammed, "there is a third: it is God himself." On the fourth night the prophet and his companion left their hiding-place, and, riding on camels which the servant of Aboo-Bekr had brought, arrived safely at Medina sixteen days after his flight from Mecca. His approach having been made known, several hundred of the citizens went out to meet him. He was welcomed with loud acclamations; and he who a few days before had left his native city as a fugitive, with a price upon his head, now entered Medina more like a king returning victorious from battle than an exile seeking a place of refuge. This separation or flight of Mohammed from the city of his nativity (called in Arabic Hej'rah or *Hij'rah) marks the commencement of the Mohammedan era.†

After Mohammed's arrival at Medina, a marked change took place in his policy. He had hitherto asserted liberty of conscience and opposed religious violence. He now maintained that the Islâm should, if necessary, be defended and propagated by the sword. "The sword," said he, "is the key of heaven and of hell: a drop of blood shed in the cause of God, or a night spent in arms, is of more avail than two months of fasting and prayer; whoever falls in battle, his sins are forgiven him, and at the day of judgment the loss of his limbs shall be supplied by the wings of cherubim." He was not long in carrying his new principles into practice. His arch-enemy, Aboo-Sofiân, had, with only thirty or forty followers, conducted a rich caravan of a thousand camels to the marts of Syria. The prophet resolved to intercept it on its return. Aboo-Sofiân, having been informed of his design, dispatched a messenger to Mecca and obtained a reinforcement of nearly a thousand men. Mohammed's troops amounted to considerably less than half that number. The hostile forces met in the vale of Bedr, (or Bedder,) about twenty miles from Medina. Mohammed was placed on a throne or pulpit whence his eye could command the field of battle. His followers, being outnumbered, were sorely pressed. At that critical moment the prophet started from his throne, mounted his horse, and threw a handful of dust into the air towards the Koreishites, crying, "Let their faces be covered with confusion!" Both armies heard his voice; the Koreishites were stricken with terror, while the Mussulmans, assured of victory, rushed forward with an enthusiasm that was irresistible. Some of the Moslem writers state that when the prophet cast dust into the air three thousand angelic warriors on white and black steeds made their appearance and swept his foes before them like a whirlwind. Seventy of the Koreishites were killed, and about the same number taken prisoners. Among the slain was Aboo-Jahl, perhaps the most bitter and ferocious of all the enemies of Islâm. His head was brought to Mohammed, who exclaimed with exultation, "This man was the Pharaoh of our people." So great was the terror and hatred he had inspired that even after his death his name was never mentioned, it is said, by true believers without the addition, "May he be accursed of God!"

* This word is often, but less correctly, written Hegira: it has, properly speaking, but two syllables. The vowel i has doubtless been added by the Italians or Germans to indicate the sound of j, (or g soft.) REISKE, in his Latin version of Aboolfedâ's (Abulfedâ's) "Moslem Annals," ("Annales Moslemici,") invariably employs gj or gi to represent the sound of our j: thus, he writes for Khadîjah Chadigja, for Aboo-Jahl Abu-Gjahl, etc.

† The era of the Hejrah is not calculated from the very day of Mohammed's flight, but from the beginning of the lunar year in which it occurred, namely, July 16, 622 A.D.

The prophet's success at Bedr was the first of that wonderful series of victories which, by spreading the new faith to the borders of China on the east and to the Atlantic Ocean on the west, were destined to change the face of the world. The Islâmites were less successful in a second encounter with their foes, near Mount Ohod, six miles north of Medina. Mohammed himself was wounded in the face with a javelin, two of his teeth were shattered with a stone, and seventy of the faithful, including Hamzah, the prophet's uncle, were left dead on the field of battle. But his enemies gained no permanent advantage. The Koreishites signally failed in an attempt to take Medina by siege. The Islâm constantly gained new adherents. "Caled [Khâled] and Amrou," says Gibbon, "the future conquerors of Syria and Egypt, most seasonably deserted the sinking cause of idolatry." Soon after, Mecca itself was taken by the followers of the prophet, who, led by Khâled, (surnamed afterwards, on account of his valour, the "Sword of God,") entered the city in three divisions. The chiefs of the Koreish were prostrate at the feet of the prophet. "What mercy," asked he, "can you expect from the man whom you have so deeply wronged?" "We trust to the generosity of our kinsman." "And you shall not trust in vain: go; you are safe, you are free." He who seven years before had left his native city as a hunted fugitive was now received and honoured as prophet and king. But in an attempt made soon after to reduce the Arabian tribes who still adhered to idolatry, the army of Mohammed was surprised in a mountain-pass, and for a time his own life was in imminent peril. Several of his devoted followers who endeavoured to shield him with their bodies fell dead at his feet. In his distress he cried, "O my brethren, I am the apostle of truth! O man, stand fast in the faith! O God, send down thine aid!" His uncle Abbâs, who was distinguished for the strength of his voice, called on the flying Moslems, repeating the promises of God to the faithful. The battle was soon restored, and what threatened to be a disastrous defeat was changed into a complete victory. About the year 630 Mohammed sent an army, under the command of Zeid, who had formerly been his slave, to invade Palestine, then belonging to the Greek empire. At the battle of Muta, where for the first time the Moslems encountered a foreign foe, Zeid and two other of the leaders were slain. It is related of Jaafar, who succeeded Zeid in the command of the army, that when his right hand was struck off he seized the banner with his left; this also being severed from his body, he embraced the standard with his bleeding stumps, until at length he fell, pierced with no fewer than fifty wounds. The day was saved by the valour of Khâled, in whose hand it is said that nine swords were broken before the hosts of the enemy were turned backward. Mohammed had to bewail, on this occasion, not only the death of his faithful servant Zeid, but also that of many of his bravest followers. We are told that when, after the battle, he first saw the young orphaned daughter of Zeid, he wept over her in speechless sorrow. "What do I see?" said one of his astonished followers. "You see," said he, "a friend weeping the loss of his most faithful friend."

The recent successes of the prophet, by inflaming the zeal of the faithful, confirming the wavering, and convincing the doubtful,—for, as it has been well observed, there is no argument like success,—contributed greatly to the rapid diffusion and final triumph of the new faith. But in the early part of 632, while he was engaged in organizing a formidable expedition against Syria, he was seized with a violent malady, (supposed by some writers to have been a fever,) which, before many days, terminated fatally. It is related that near the beginning of this illness Mohammed said to one of his attendants, "The choice is given me either to remain on earth until the end of time, or soon to depart to the presence of God: I have chosen the latter." When he perceived that his end was near, supported by the arms of Alee and another relative, he went into the mosque and asked publicly if he had injured any one,—if so, he was ready to make full amends, or to suffer himself what he had inflicted on others. As no one answered, he asked again if he owed any man anything. A voice replied, "Yes,—to me, three drachms of silver." The prophet ordered the money to be paid, and thanked his creditor that he made his complaint now instead of deferring it till the day of judgment. His last words were the utterance of a broken prayer,—"O God, pardon my sins—yes—I come!" He died, according to the Arabian historians, on his birthday, the eleventh year of the Hejrah, (632 A.D.,) aged 63, or, according to some authorities, 65 years. He had ceased to breathe, but his followers refused to believe that he was dead. Omăr, in his fierce zeal, threatened to strike off the heads of the infidels who should dare to assert that the great prophet and intercessor with God was no more. The authority of Aboo-Bekr was required to appease the tumult. "Is it Mohammed, or the God of Mohammed, whom you worship? God liveth for ever and ever; but Mohammed, though his prophet and apostle, was mortal like ourselves, and, in dying, has but fulfilled his own prediction."

In person Mohammed was of middle stature, with broad shoulders and chest, square-built and strong, with large hands and feet. The unusual size of his head was partly concealed by long and slightly-curling locks of hair. His forehead was broad and fair for an Arab, and his fine eyebrows were separated by a vein which swelled up and became very conspicuous when he was angry. His eyelashes were long, and his eyes dark and glowing. His nose was large, prominent, and slightly hooked; his mouth was wide, but adorned with a fine set of teeth. According to some accounts, he stooped, and was slightly round-shouldered. His natural disposition appears to have been in a high degree kindly and humane. "He was naturally irritable," says Irving, "but had brought his temper under great control." One of his servants said, "I served him from the time I was eight years old, and he never scolded me, though things were sometimes spoiled by me." "He was," says a writer* who will scarcely be accused of exaggerating his virtues, "kind to women,—never beat one, and entertained more respect for them than is usual with nations addicted to polygamy. He frequently protected women who came to him for refuge. . . . He forbade the believers to beat their wives; but on the remonstrance of Omăr, who said that the wives would have the upper hand over their husbands, he allowed it." Nevertheless, he insisted that women should be fairly and justly treated, and not beaten unless the occasion absolutely demanded it. His own wives, having once become rebellious, were brought to submission by a revelation from Heaven and the blows of their relatives,† the prophet himself being disinclined to such severity, either from kindness of heart or from a regard to his apostolic dignity.

"He was," says Sprenger, "affectionate towards his relations; and, notwithstanding the gravity of his office, he was playful with his wives. Ayeshah, being only nine years of age when she married him, brought her toys into his house, and he occasionally played with her. She also used to race with him. . . . He would sometimes tell stories to his wives, such as the adventures of the man who had been carried away by the jinn (genii) and, after a long stay with them, returned to his family."

The intellectual powers of Mohammed were of a very high order, and as a poet he ranks far above all others who have ever written in the Arabic tongue. It was usual for his followers to point to the beauty and sublimity of the Koran as an irrefutable proof of his divine inspiration; and he himself, in one of the chapters of that sacred poem, boldly challenges men and angels to produce anything to equal it, and confidently affirms that God alone could have dictated so incomparable a work. Probably no poet that ever lived more fully realized the state of mind known as poetic furor than Mohammed. It is said that while he was composing certain portions of the Koran he was in a state of such intense excitement as amounted almost to frenzy; and, if we may believe those accounts of his life which seem best authenticated, some at least of the revelations of the Koran were actually communicated (or were believed by him to have been communicated) during his epileptic paroxysms, while wholly unconscious of things around him. With this view, there may have been no arrogance or vanity in his claiming that to rival the Koran was beyond the power of men or angels. Referring to the prophet's tendency to poetic and elevated thought, Sprenger says, "His mind dwelt constantly on the contemplation of God: he saw his finger in the rising sun, in the falling rain, in the growing crop; he heard his voice in the thunder, in the murmuring of the waters, and in the hymns which the birds sing to his praise; and in the lonely deserts and ruins of ancient cities he saw the traces of his anger." But combined with all his poetic and religious enthusiasm was a vein of strong common sense. He was free from all ostentation and parade: that he pretended to work miracles, is a calumny of his enemies. He considered it miracle enough that he was inspired with the Spirit of God: this he doubtless believed in all sincerity. One whom Heaven had so highly honoured had no need of earthly dignity or worldly splendour. He set a praiseworthy example of indifference to earthly riches, of patriarchal simplicity of manners, and of frugality in his diet and dress. With his own hands he milked his goats, and afterwards attended to his person. The costly presents which he received he gave to his friends. The riches which he obtained from the spoils of war and from tribute were spent in promoting the interests of religion and in relieving the wants of the poor. "His military triumphs," says Irving, "awakened no pride nor vain-glory. . . . In the time of his greatest power he maintained the same simplicity of manners and appearance as in the days of his adversity. So far from affecting regal state, he was displeased if on entering a room any unusual testimonial of respect were shown him."

The most glaring moral defect of Mohammed's character was his passion for women, to justify which he pretended that he had received a special revelation from heaven ;‡ and, while only four lawful wives were allowed to his followers, he himself had eleven wives, besides several concubines. Mohammed's conduct in this respect, viewed in connection with his pretended revelations, would seem to go very far towards justifying those who consider him to have been simply an artful and selfish impostor. "But, however he betrayed the alloy of earth," observes Irving, "after he had worldly power at his command, the early aspirations of his spirit continually returned and bore him above all earthly things. . . . On the mercy of God he reposed all his hopes of heaven." His wife Ayeshah once asked him if it were indeed true that none could enter paradise except through God's mercy. "None—none!" he replied, with emphatic earnestness. And when she again asked if an exception would not be made in his case, he answered, with great solemnity, "Neither can I enter paradise unless God clothe me with his mercy."

Until recently, the belief has universally prevailed in Christendom that Mohammed was not merely the teacher of a false religion, but a conscious impostor, an artful, self-seeking charlatan. But such a theory of his life and character will not bear examination. Not to mention the thousand incidental proofs of his sincerity which are scattered through the history of his early life, it is wholly incredible that a mere self-seeking charlatan would have exposed himself to universal obloquy and certain persecution, in the wild hope that he might at last triumph over those religious prejudices which had been for so many ages gaining strength among his countrymen. When Aboo-Tâlib, weary of defending his nephew against the implacable hostility of the Koreishites, besought him to abandon a course attended with so much peril to himself and his kinsmen, he replied, "O uncle, I swear by God that if they put the sun on my right hand and the moon on my left, I will not renounce the career I have entered upon until God gives me success, or until I perish." Aboo-Tâlib, touched with his heroic spirit, solemnly promised that he would not give him up, whatever he might preach.

In considering the question of Mohammed's sincerity, it must not be forgotten that he possessed not only a vivid and powerful imagination, but a very peculiar physical and mental constitution. It seems not unreasonable to believe, as traditions relate, that in those nervous paroxysms to which he was subject he had visions not unlike those which his mother saw between sleeping and waking. Such visions would be almost certain to partake of the character of those earnest thoughts and convictions with which his waking soul was filled; and nothing could be more natural than for such a mind not merely to regard those visions as a divine confirmation of his peculiar views, but to employ them, modified as they would necessarily be by his powerful imagination, to give force and authority to his public teachings. Nor will it appear at all unreasonable to those conversant with human nature that one who was perfectly sincere at the beginning of his career should afterwards—under the stimulus of fear, lust, hatred, or ambition—pretend to visions which he never had, for the purpose of giving a divine sanction to his cherished opinions, or, it may be, to his arbitrary caprices or selfish desires. How often, indeed, have the professors of a far purer and higher faith resorted to stratagem and deceit to promote what they sincerely believed to be a good cause, which they had not faith enough to trust to the care of Heaven or to the legitimate operation of purely moral influences!

While we must admit, with one of the prophet's ablest and most successful defenders, (Carlyle,) that in the Moslem heaven and hell "there is enough that shocks all spiritual feeling in us," we must also admit, on a candid examination, that his religion, on the whole, made him and his followers better, and not worse. In estimating the influence of the Islâm upon the nations which embraced it, it would be obviously unjust to take as a standard of comparison the highest forms of Christian civilization. We should rather compare the condition of those nations under the sway of Mohammedanism with their condition as it was before the advent of the prophet. If the religion of Mohammed was immeasurably inferior to the religion of Christ, it was in most respects greatly superior to every form of paganism of which we have any knowledge, and probably also to much of that spurious or half-spurious Christianity which it displaced in Western Asia and Northern Africa.

"The general tenor of Mahomet's conduct," says Irving, "up to the time of his flight from Mecca, is that of an enthusiast acting under a species of mental delusion,—deeply imbued with a conviction of his being a divine agent for religious reform; and there is something striking and sublime in the luminous path which his enthusiastic spirit struck out for itself through the bewildering maze of adverse faiths and wild traditions,—the pure and spiritual worship of the one true God, which he sought to substitute for the blind idolatry of his childhood. . . . All the parts of the Koran supposed to have been promulgated by him at this time—incoherently as they have come down to us, and marred as their pristine beauty must be in passing through various hands—are of a pure and elevated character, and breathe poetical, if not religious, inspiration. They show that he had drunk deep of the living waters of Christianity; and if he had failed to imbibe them in their crystal purity, it might be because he had to drink from broken cisterns and streams troubled and perverted by those who should have been their guardians."

Molai or Molay, de, deh mo'lā',* (JACQUES,) last grand master of the order of the Templars, was born in Burgundy. The wealth and power to which this order had arisen having excited the jealousy of Philippe le Bel, King of France, and Pope Clement IV., a plan was laid by the two sovereigns for their destruction. Molai, being invited to France in 1306, was arrested on his arrival, together with all the Templars in that country, and, on various criminal charges, condemned to death. Nearly sixty of the knights perished at the stake; and the grand master, after seven years' imprisonment, shared their fate, in 1314.

Molbech, mol'bĕK, (CHRISTIAN,) an eminent Danish historian, philologist, and bibliographer, born at Soröe in 1783. After travelling in England and other countries of Europe, he became in 1823 professor of the history of literature, and first secretary of the Royal Library, at Copenhagen. Among his principal works are a "History of the Wars of Ditmarschen," (1813,) "Danish Dialect-Lexicon," (1837,) and "History of Erik Plogpenning," (1846.) He published between 1814 and 1817 a literary journal of great merit, entitled the "Athene," and subsequently became editor of the "Nordisk Tidskrift" and "Historisk Tidskrift," (1840.) Molbech also had a share in the great "Dictionary of the Danish Language," (unfinished.) Died at Copenhagen in 1857.

See ERSLEW, "Forfatter-Lexicon."

Molbech, (CHRISTIAN KNUD FREDERIK,) a Danish poet, a son of the preceding, was born at Copenhagen in 1821. He produced "Dante," a drama, and lyric poems, (1846,) which are highly commended. D. 1888.

Molé, mo'lȧ', (FRANÇOIS RENÉ,) a celebrated French comedian, born in Paris in 1734. He was a member of the Institute, and director of the Academy at the Théâtre Français. Died in 1802.

Molé, (LOUIS MATHIEU,) COUNT, an eminent French statesman, born in Paris in 1781, was descended from Mathieu Molé, noticed below. He published in 1805 "Moral and Political Essays," which procured for him the favour of Napoleon, by whom he was soon after appointed master of requests, and prefect of the Côte-d'Or. In 1813 he succeeded the Duke of Massa as minister of justice. He was created a peer by Louis XVIII., and in 1817 became minister of the marine. Under Louis Philippe he was minister of foreign affairs from August to November, 1830, and became in April, 1837, prime minister; but, overcome by the opposition of Guizot, Thiers, and Berryer, he resigned his post, March 31, 1839. In 1840 he succeeded De Quelen in the French Academy. Died in 1855.

Moleschott, mo'lęs-sKot', (JACOB,) a Dutch naturalist and physiologist, born at Bois-le-Duc in 1822, studied medicine and natural science at Heidelberg, and settled as a physician at Utrecht. He was the author of a "Critical Examination of Liebig's Theory of the Alimentation of Plants," (1845,) "Doctrine of Aliments," (1850,) "Circular Motion of Life," (1852,) and other similar works. He became professor of physiology and anthropology at Heidelberg in 1847, and of physiology at Zurich in 1855. Among his works are "Light and Life," ("Licht und Leben," 1856,) and one on George Forster, entitled "Georg Forster der Naturforscher des Volks," (1854.) He is ranked among the most prominent advocates of the materialistic philosophy, (although he recognizes a mixture of spiritual life with the material life of the universe.) He totally rejects the idea of creation in the ordinary signification of the term, referring the origin of all the species of animals to the operation of universal and unchangeable physical laws.

Molesworth, mōlz'wǫrth, (MARY LOUISA, née Stewart,) a Scottish author, born in 1842, on the Continent, and long a resident of Paris. Among her numerous tales are "Hathercourt Rectory" and "Miss Bouverie," (1880.)

Molesworth, mōlz'wǫrth, (ROBERT,) VISCOUNT, a statesman and diplomatist, born at Dublin in 1656. He was appointed by William III. a member of his privy council, and in 1692 was envoy-extraordinary to Denmark. He published, after his return, an "Account of Denmark," a severe criticism on the government and customs of the Danes, which gave great offence to that people but was very popular in England. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society, and numbered among his friends Locke and Lord Shaftesbury. Died in 1725.

Moleville, (ANTOINE FRANÇOIS BERTRAND.) See BERTRAND DE MOLLEVILLE.

Molière, mo'le-aiR', a celebrated French comic author and actor, whose original name was Jean Baptiste Poquelin, (pok'lăN',) was born in Paris on the 15th of January, 1622. He received instruction in private from the philosopher Gassendi, and in his youth assisted his father, who was a dealer in tapestry, (marchand tapissier.) He became valet-de-chambre to the king, Louis XIII., about 1640. Having assumed the name of Molière, he adopted the profession of comic actor about 1644, and a few years later appeared in the provinces at the head of a small troupe which he had formed. His first regular drama was "The Giddy-Head," ("L'Étourdi,") which was performed with success by his troupe at Lyons in 1653. Attracted to the capital by a growing ambition, and favoured with royal patronage, he opened there a theatre in 1658. His "Affected Ladies," ("Précieuses ridicules,") a satire on the affected style and euphuism which were then in fashion, was performed with great applause in 1659. "Sganarelle" came out in 1660. His fame was increased by his "School for Husbands," ("École des Maris," 1661,) a comedy of manners, character, and intrigue. He produced in 1666 "The Misanthrope," esteemed one of his master-pieces. "The dialogue of this," says Hallam, "is uniformly of the highest style; the female and indeed all the characters are excellently conceived and sustained." Still more popular was the "Hypocrite," ("Tartuffe," 1667,) an original creation in dramatic poetry, and generally considered the greatest effort of his genius. He was the author of about thirty other comedies, in verse or prose, among which "The Bores," ("Les Fâcheux," 1661,) the "School for Wives," ("École des Femmes," 1662,) "Love (or Cupid) as Physician," ("L'Amour Médecin," 1665,) "Le Médecin malgré lui," (1666,) "The Miser," ("L'Avare," 1667,) "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," (1670,) "Learned (or Pedantic) Ladies," ("Femmes savantes," 1672,) and "The Imaginary Invalid," (or "Hypochondriac,") ("Le Malade imaginaire," 1672,) are greatly admired. Died in Paris, February 17, 1673.

There is perhaps in the whole history of literature no more remarkable instance of the triumph of genius than is presented to us in the career of Molière. Seldom, if ever, were the pride and tyranny of rank more predominant than in France in the latter half of the seventeenth century. Yet many of the French nobility treated Molière as a companion and equal. "Come to me at any hour you please," said the great Prince de Condé to our author: "you have but to announce your name: your visit can never be ill-timed." (See Scott's "Miscellanies.") The success of "Tartuffe" was a signal victory achieved in the face of an all-prevailing bigotry, which was strongly entwined in the very spirit of the age and had struck deep root into the heart of the king himself. But the castle of prejudice, invincible to every other assault, was fain to open its reluctant gates to the transcendent genius of Molière. He was remarkable not merely for his wonderful comic talent, but for his admirable delineation of human nature as it appears in all countries and all ages. "In the more appropriate merits of comedy," says Hallam, "in just and forcible delineation of character, skilful contrivance of circumstances, and humorous dialogue, we must award him the prize." The same eminent critic thinks "that Shakspeare had the greater genius, but perhaps Molière has written the best comedies." He was not a member of the French Academy. After Molière's death, that learned body placed his bust in their hall, with this beautiful and appropriate inscription:

"Rien ne manque à sa gloire; il manquait à la nôtre."*

Monet, mo′nȧ′, (Philibert,) a French scholar and philologist, born at Bonneville, in Savoy, in 1566. He wrote "Ligatures des Langues Françoise et Latine," (1629,) and other works. Died in 1643.

Mo-ne′tạ, a surname given by the Romans to Juno. The temple of Juno Moneta at Rome was used as a mint, which in Latin is called moneta.

Moneti, mo-nā′tee, (Francesco,) an Italian poet, born at Cortona about 1635; died in 1712.

Monfalcon, mȯn′fȧl′kȯn′, (Jean Baptiste,) a French physician and historian, born in Lyons in 1792. He practised in his native city, and wrote, besides other works, a "Code moral des Ouvriers," (1835,) and a "History of Lyons," (2 vols., 1846–47.) Died in 1874.

Mongault, mȯn′gō′, (Nicolas Hubert,) a French littérateur, born in Paris in 1674. He made translations of the "History" of Herodian and the "Letters of Cicero to Atticus." The latter is particularly esteemed, and the notes accompanying it are said to have furnished Middleton with important matter for his "Life of Cicero." Mongault was a member of the French Academy and of the Academy of Inscriptions. Died in 1746.

Monge, mȯnzh, (Gaspard,) Comte de Péluse, a celebrated French savant, and the creator of descriptive geometry, was born at Beaune in 1746. Soon after he left the College of Lyons he obtained a place in the college of military engineers at Mézières. Having by his skill in geometry made an important improvement in the process used in the art of fortification, he became, about the age of twenty, professor of mathematics and of natural philosophy at Mézières. While he filled these chairs with great credit, he gradually perfected the application of geometry to the arts of construction, which is now called descriptive geometry. In 1780 he was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences, and in 1783 removed to Paris, where he was employed as examiner of candidates for the marine, for whose use he wrote an able "Treatise on Statics." His political affinities in the Revolution were with the republicans, who appointed him minister of the marine in 1792. He resigned in April, 1793, and distinguished himself by his zealous services in the fabrication of arms, gunpowder, and other materials, which were urgently required for the national defence. In 1795 he published the first edition of his excellent "Descriptive Geometry," and assisted in organizing the Polytechnic School, in which he taught geometry and analysis. Monge, Fourier, and Berthollet were the directors of the scientific commission which accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt in 1798. Aided by pupils of the Polytechnic School, they executed the geodesic and monumental description of that country. Having returned home with Bonaparte, he presided over the arrangement and publication of the great work by which French science and art illustrated Egypt. During the Napoleonic régime he became a senator, Count of Péluse, and grand officer of the legion of honour. In 1816 he was expelled from the Institute on account of his political antecedents. He died in 1818. He left an important work called "Application of Analysis to Geometry." His discoveries in geometry form an epoch in that science, for which he is said to have done more than any one since the time of Archimedes.

Monk, mŭnk, (Edwin George,) Mus. Doc., an English musician and composer, born at Frome, Somerset, in 1819. He has published some sacred compositions, and edited collections of hymn- and psalm-tunes.

Monk, mŭnk, (George,) Duke of Albemarle, a successful English general, born in 1608, was the son of Sir Thomas Monk, of Merton, Devonshire. After fighting in the service of Holland, he returned to England about the age of thirty. In the civil war he bore arms for Charles I., and had acquired some reputation as an able officer when he was made prisoner at Nantwich in 1644 by the Roundheads, who confined him in the Tower of London more than a year. Having accepted a commission from the Parliament, he commanded a republican army in the north of Ireland between 1646 and 1650. He contributed to the victory of Cromwell at Dunbar, in 1650, and the next year was left in Scotland as commander of an army, with which he speedily completed the reduction of that country. Hume states that he put to the sword all the inhabitants of Dundee, which he had taken by assault; though he elsewhere says his temper was humane and his moderation remarkable. In 1653 the government showed their confidence in his skill by selecting him to co-operate with Admiral Blake in a naval war against the Dutch. He commanded in the sea-fight where Van Tromp was defeated and killed. In 1654 he was successful in his efforts to enforce the will and authority of the Protector in Scotland. At the death of Oliver, in 1658, Monk proclaimed Richard Cromwell as his successor. When the officers of the army deposed Richard and restored the Long Parliament, he acquiesced, and retained command of the army in Scotland. The royalists and republicans solicited his aid in the impending crisis; but he kept all parties in suspense by his dissimulation or irresolution. About the beginning of 1660 he marched towards London, ostensibly to support the civil power against Lambert's army. "Cold-blooded and taciturn," says Macaulay, "zealous for no polity and for no religion, he maintained an impenetrable reserve" when he was implored to restore peace to the nation. Having cautiously removed from command those whom he distrusted, and prepared the way for the restoration, he declared for a free Parliament, which soon assembled, amidst general joy and exultation. Charles II. was proclaimed king in May, 1660, and rewarded the services of Monk by creating him Duke of Albemarle. In 1666 Monk maintained his reputation in a great naval battle against the Dutch. He died in 1670, leaving a son, at whose death the family became extinct. Hume, after a eulogy of his character, says, "I confess, however, that Dr. Douglas has shown me an original letter of his, containing very earnest and certainly false protestations of his zeal for a commonwealth."

Monmouth, mon'mŭth, (JAMES SCOTT,) DUKE OF, born in 1649, was a natural son of Charles II. of England. His mother's name was Lucy Walters. He married about 1665 Anne Scott, Duchess of Buccleuch, said to have been the richest heiress in the kingdom, and assumed her name. He received the title of Duke of Buccleuch, and was loaded with royal favours. His personal advantages and agreeable manners rendered him very popular. "Though a libertine," says Macaulay, "he won the hearts of the Puritans." A rivalry or jealousy arose between him and the Duke of York, afterwards James II., through whose influence Monmouth was discarded from court. He was in Holland when Charles II. died, (1684.) A report that Charles II. had married Lucy Walters privately was credulously received by the populace, who regarded Monmouth as the rightful heir to the throne and the champion of the Protestant cause. With a party of armed exiles he invaded England in June, 1685, and raised the standard of rebellion. He was received with enthusiasm by the people, and gained a victory over the royal troops at Axminster; but he was completely defeated at Sedgemoor, July 6, and captured a few days later. Having been taken into the presence of King James, he threw himself at his feet, and, with abject spirit, begged for life at any price, but in vain. He was executed in July, 1685.

Monnet, mo'nā', (ANTOINE GRIMOALD,) a French chemist, born in Auvergne in 1734, was appointed inspector-general of mines. He opposed and undervalued the discoveries of Lavoisier, Berthollet, and others, and thus injured his own reputation. He published a "Treatise on the Solution of Metals," (1775,) "Historical and Political Memoir on the Mines of France," (1791,) and numerous other scientific works. Died in 1817.

Monnet, (LOUIS CLAUDE,) BARON, a French general, born in 1766. He commanded at Flushing when it was taken by the English in 1809. For this ill success he was condemned to death; but he was then a prisoner in England. Died in 1819.

Monnier, mo'ne-ā', (HENRI BONAVENTURE,) a French littérateur, comedian, and caricaturist, born in Paris in 1799. He represented and caricatured the life and manners of the common people with the pen, and published several volumes of "Scènes populaires dessinées à la Plume," (1830–46.) Among his works is "Mémoires de M. Prudhomme." Died in 1877.

Monnier, (JEAN CHARLES,) COMTE, a French general, born at Cavaillon in 1758. He led a division at Marengo in June, 1800. Died in 1816.

Monnier, (LOUIS GABRIEL,) a French engraver, born at Besançon in 1733; died at Dijon in 1804.

Monnier, de, dẹh mo'ne-ā', (MARIE THÉRÈSE Richard de Ruffey—re'shăR' dẹh rü'fā',) MARQUISE, a French lady, known under the name of SOPHIE, and celebrated in consequence of her connection with Mirabeau, was born at Pontarlier in 1754. Died in 1789. (See MIRABEAU.)

Monnier, Le, lẹh mo'ne-ā', (PIERRE,) a French savant, born in Normandy about 1675, published a work entitled "Course of Philosophy." He was a member of the Academy of Sciences. Died in 1757.

Monnoie or Monnoye, de la, dẹh lā mo'nwā', (BERNARD,) a French poet and critic, born at Dijon in 1641. He was the author of a poem entitled "The Duel Abolished," which obtained the first prize ever awarded by the French Academy. He was elected a member of that institution in 1713. He also published poems in Latin and French, and several critical treatises. Died in 1728.

See R. DE JUVIGNY, "Mémoire historique sur la Vie, etc. de La Monnoye."

Monnoyer, mo'nwā'yā', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a celebrated painter of flowers and fruit, born at Lille, in Flanders, in 1635. Having visited Paris, he was employed in the decoration of Versailles and the Trianon. He afterwards repaired to England, where he executed some of his best works. Among his master-pieces are the flower-border of a mirror at Kensington, and the decorations of Montagu House. His flower-pieces have never been surpassed for brilliancy of colouring and free and graceful grouping. He died in 1699, leaving a son, ANTOINE, who was also a flower-painter.

See R. DUMESNIL, "Le Peintre-Graveur Français."

Monod, mo'nod', (ADOLPHE,) an eminent Swiss Protestant minister, born about 1800. He lectured on theology and Hebrew at the College of Montauban from 1836 to 1852, and became minister of the Reformed Church of Paris in 1853. He acquired a wide reputation as a preacher and moralist, and wrote numerous religious treatises. He belonged to the most orthodox school of French Protestants. Died in 1856.

Monod, (FRÉDÉRIC,) a Swiss Protestant minister, born at Monnaz, in the Canton de Vaud, in 1794, was a brother of the preceding. He became in 1832 pastor of the Protestant sect called "Évangélistes libres," in Paris. He edited for many years "The Archives of Christianity," and published a number of sermons. Died in 1863.

Monod, (JEAN,) a Swiss Protestant divine, born at Geneva in 1765, was the father of the preceding. He was pastor of a church in Paris, and in 1830 became president of the Consistory of the Reformed Church. He contributed to the "Biographie Universelle" many notices of eminent Swiss writers, etc. Died in 1836.

Monpou, môN'poo', (HIPPOLYTE,) a French composer and singer, born in Paris in 1804. He composed popular ballads and operas, among which is "Les deux Reines," (1835.) Died in 1841.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Monrad, mon'rād, (DITLEV GOTHARD,) a Danish bishop, born at Copenhagen, November 24, 1811. In 1849 he was made Bishop of Laaland. He was at various times minister of worship, of the interior, and of finance. He was president of the Legislative Chamber during the war which in 1864 detached Sleswick and Holstein from Denmark. He lived in New Zealand from 1864 to 1869. He returned to his diocese in 1871. Died in 1887.

Mon-rō', (ALEXANDER, distinguished as Primus, i.e. the "first,") an eminent physician and anatomist, born in London in 1697. He studied successively in London, Paris, and at Leyden under Boerhaave, and was appointed, after his return, demonstrator of anatomy to the Surgeons' Company at Edinburgh. The lectures he delivered at this time won for him a high reputation, and were chiefly instrumental in founding the Medical School of Edinburgh. Under his direction also was established the Royal Infirmary of that city, in which he gave clinical lectures on surgery. He published in 1726 his "Osteology, or Treatise on the Anatomy of the Bones," which passed through numerous editions and was translated into French and German. Among his other works are an "Essay on Comparative Anatomy," (1744,) and "Account of the Inoculation of Small-Pox in Scotland," (1765.) Dr. Monro was a Fellow of the Royal Society of London, and a member of the Academy of Surgery in Paris. Died in 1767.

See A. DUNCAN, "Account of the Life, etc. of Alexander Monro," 1780; "Life of Alexander Monro," prefixed to his works; CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

Monro, (ALEXANDER Secundus, or the "second,") son of the preceding, was born at Edinburgh in 1732. He succeeded his father in the chair of anatomy and surgery in the University of Edinburgh in 1759. He died in 1817, leaving a number of medical treatises of great merit. Among these we may name "Observations on the Structure, etc. of the Nervous System," (1783,) and "Structure and Physiology of Fishes," (1785.)

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

Monro, (ALEXANDER Tertius, or the "third,") a physician, a son of the preceding, was born in Edinburgh about 1774. He was professor of anatomy at Edinburgh, and published several works on anatomy and medicine. Died in 1859.

Monro, (DONALD,) brother of Alexander, (1732–1817,) was born at Edinburgh in 1729. He was appointed chief physician to the army, which he accompanied to Germany in 1761. He published, among other works, a treatise "On the Means of Preserving the Health of Soldiers." Died in 1802.

Monro, (JOHN,) an English physician, born at Greenwich in 1715, was the author of "Remarks on Battie's Treatise on Madness." Died in 1791.

Monroe, mŭn-rō', (JAMES,) an American statesman, and the fifth President of the United States, was born in Westmoreland county, Virginia, April 28, 1758. He was a son of Spence Monroe, a planter, was educated at William and Mary College, and entered the army as a cadet in 1776. He soon became a lieutenant in the army of Washington, and served at the battles of Harlem Heights and White Plains. He was wounded in the battle of Trenton, December, 1776, and for his conduct there was promoted to the rank of captain. As aide-de-camp to Lord Stirling, he served with distinction at the battle of Brandywine, September, 1777, and at that of Monmouth, June, 1778. Having lost his rank in the regular army by becoming an aide to Lord Stirling, he retired from the service in 1778, and studied law under Thomas Jefferson. He was elected a member of the Assembly of Virginia in 1782, and a delegate to the General Congress in 1783 for three years. He married, about 1785, a Miss Kortright, of New York.

As a member of the Convention of Virginia, in 1788, he opposed the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, which, in his opinion, gave too much power to the Federal government. He accordingly united himself with the Anti-Federalists, or Republican party, and was elected a Senator of the United States for four years by the legislature of Virginia in 1790. In 1794 he was sent to France as minister-plenipotentiary. He offended the heads of the home government by the open expression of sympathy with the French republicans, or by a departure from a neutral policy, and was recalled about the end of 1796. He was Governor of Virginia three years, (1799–1802.) In 1802 he was sent to France as envoy-extraordinary, to unite with Edward Livingston, then the resident minister at Paris, in a negotiation for the purchase of Louisiana,—i.e. the whole valley of the Mississippi. They purchased that vast territory from Bonaparte for $15,000,000. In 1803 Mr. Monroe was sent as minister-plenipotentiary to England, and in 1805 performed a diplomatic mission to Spain in relation to the boundary of Louisiana. He returned to London in 1806, and, aided by Mr. Pinckney, negotiated a treaty for the protection of maritime interests and neutral rights; but the government of the United States refused to ratify this treaty, because it did not provide against the impressment of seamen. He returned home in 1808, and passed about two years in a private station.

In 1811 he was elected Governor of Virginia. He was appointed secretary of state by President Madison in November, 1811. He acted as secretary of war during the disastrous and gloomy period that followed the capture of Washington, September, 1814–March, 1815, and rendered important services by his energetic measures to restore the public credit and reinforce the army. He did not cease to be secretary of state until March, 1817. He was the Democratic candidate for the Presidency in 1816, and was elected by a large majority, receiving one hundred and eighty-three electoral votes. His competitor was Rufus King, who received thirty-four votes. He appointed John Q. Adams secretary of state, William H. Crawford secretary of the treasury, John C. Calhoun secretary of war, and Smith Thompson secretary of the navy. The violence of party spirit abated during his administration, which encountered no strong opposition. In 1819 Spain ceded Florida to the United States. He was re-elected President in 1820 without opposition, receiving every electoral vote except one. During his second term the independence of the South American colonies of Spain was recognized by the United States. In his message of December, 1823, he asserted the important principle of foreign policy which forms the celebrated "Monroe Doctrine," in these terms: "We owe it, therefore, to candour and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers, [i.e. the European powers,] to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety." He retired from office in March, 1825, after which he resided at Oak Hill, Loudon county, Virginia. He was elected president of the convention which met in 1829 to revise the Constitution of Virginia. A speech which he made in that Convention contains this incidental remark on slavery:—"No imputation can be cast on Virginia in this matter. She did all that was in her power to do, to prevent the extension of slavery and to mitigate its evils so far as she could."* He died in the city of New York, at the residence of his son-in-law, Samuel L. Gouverneur, on the 4th of July, 1831, leaving the reputation of a discreet and successful statesman, more distinguished for administrative talents than for oratorical powers.

Mons, van, vȧn môns or môNss, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) an eminent Belgian chemist and pomologist, was born at Brussels in 1765. Having learned the art of pharmacy, he was chosen in 1797 professor of chemistry, etc. in Brussels. He founded the "Journal de Chimie et Physique," which for many years was a central dépôt of the progress of science in Europe. Having a ruling passion for the culture of fruit, he began at an early age to theorize and experiment on the production of new varieties. About the age of twenty he adopted the theory that seedlings of new varieties have more tendency to improve than those of old varieties, or, in other words, while good old varieties mostly produce inferior sorts, those which are recent and bad tend to change for the better. Having planted a large nursery and devoted his life chiefly to experiments on the pear, he was successful in producing many fine varieties, among which was the Beurré Diel. Soon after 1815 he was appointed professor of chemistry at Louvain. He published "Principles of Electricity," (1802,) "Principles of Philosophic Chemistry," (1818,) "Fruit-Trees and their Culture," (1835,) and other works. He was an associate of the Institute of France. Died in 1842. "The constant springing up of fine new sorts of fruit in the United States," says Downing, "is given with much apparent force as a proof of the accuracy of the Van Mons theory."

Montagny, môn'tȧn'ye', (ÉTIENNE,) a French sculptor, born at Saint-Étienne in 1816. He obtained a medal of the first class for a statue of Saint Louis, in 1859.

Mŏn'ta-gū, (BASIL,) an eminent English lawyer and writer, born in London in 1770, was a natural son of John Montagu, Earl of Sandwich. Having graduated at Cambridge, he was called to the bar in 1798. He practised with ability and success, and extended his reputation by numerous legal publications, the most important of which is a "Digest of the Bankrupt Laws, with a Collection of the Statutes and of the Cases determined upon that Subject," (1805.) He was associated with Romilly and Wilberforce in successful effort to abolish hanging for forgery and for certain other crimes. In 1825 he produced a valuable edition of Lord Bacon's works, on which he expended the labour of many years; also a "Life of Bacon," in reference to which Macaulay says, "About his merit as a collector of materials there can be no dispute; and we are indebted to his minute and accurate researches for the means of refuting what we cannot but consider his errors." He published "Essays and Selections," and various other works. Died in 1851.

Montagu, (EDWARD WORTLEY,) son of Lady Mary Montagu, noticed below, was born in Yorkshire in 1713. At an early age he manifested a propensity to low vices, and great eccentricity of character. When placed at school he repeatedly ran away, and at length hired himself as a cabin-boy in a ship bound for Spain. Being discovered and sent back to his family, he travelled soon after on the continent. After his return he was member of two successive Parliaments. He next went to Italy, where he was converted to Catholicism, and not long after visited Egypt, and there professed Mohammedanism. He was the author of "Reflections on the Rise and Fall of Ancient Republics." Died in 1776.

Montagu, (HENRY.) See MANCHESTER, EARL OF.

Montagu, (Lady MARY WORTLEY,) a celebrated English writer, born in Nottinghamshire about 1690. She was the daughter of Evelyn Pierrepont, Duke of Kingston, and Lady Mary Fielding, and cousin to the novelist Henry Fielding. She was early distinguished for the brilliancy of her intellect and her rapid acquisition of knowledge. In 1712 she was married to Edward Wortley Montagu, Esq., and a few years after, on his appointment to a place in the treasury, accompanied him to London. Here she attracted general admiration by her wit and remarkable beauty, and became intimate with Addison, Pope, and other celebrated writers of the time. In 1716 she accompanied her husband, on his being appointed ambassador, to Constantinople. During her residence of two years at the Porte, she wrote to her friends in England a series of Letters containing shrewd and lively descriptions of Oriental life and manners. On her return to England she became the means of introducing the Turkish practice of inoculation, having had the courage to have the experiment first tried on her own son. The next remarkable event in Lady Mary's life is her quarrel with Pope, the cause of which is not with certainty known. In 1739 she left England for Italy, where she resided upwards of twenty years. She returned in 1761, and died the following year. Besides the son mentioned above, she left a daughter Mary, who was married to the Earl of Bute, minister of George III.

Lady Mary wrote a number of poems, of which the "Town Eclogues" only are entitled to much notice. Her literary reputation is owing chiefly to her "Letters," which are ranked among the finest specimens of epistolary composition.

Montague, mŏn'ta-gū, (Sir EDWARD,) an English statesman, born in Northamptonshire. He was appointed chief justice of the court of king's bench in 1539, and chief justice of the common pleas in 1546. He was one of the counsellors designated in the will of Henry VIII. to administer the government during the minority of Edward VI. Died in 1556.

See FULLER, "Worthies of England;" COLLINS, "Peerage of England."

Montague, (EDWARD,) Earl of Sandwich, an English naval commander, born in 1625. He served for a time on the side of the Parliament, but subsequently went over to the royalists, and assisted General Monk in the restoration of Charles II. For this service he was successively created an earl, a knight of the Garter, member of the privy council, and admiral of the Narrow Seas. On the renewal of the war with Holland, in 1672, Lord Sandwich commanded the squadron under the Duke of York against De Ruyter, and perished in the burning of the Royal James.

See CAMPBELL, "Lives of the Admirals;" CLARENDON, "Memoirs."

Montague, (ELIZABETH,) a celebrated English lady, born in Yorkshire in 1720. Her early studies were directed by Dr. Conyers Middleton, who was connected with her family. In 1742 she was married to Edward Montague, Esq. After the death of her husband, in 1775, she resided in Portman Square, London, where she numbered among her visitors the most eminent men of the day, including Burke, Johnson, Goldsmith, and Reynolds. She was also intimate with Mrs. Elizabeth Carter and Hannah More. Mrs. Montague contributed several "Dialogues of the Dead" to those published by Lord Lyttelton; but her principal work is an "Essay on the Genius and Writings of Shakespeare," which obtained for her a high reputation. In this production she has ably refuted the false charges of Voltaire against the great English poet. She is said to have been the founder of the literary society called the "Blue-Stocking Club." Her correspondence was published after her death. Died in 1800.

Montague, (GEORGE,) an English naturalist, born in Wiltshire. In 1802 he published an "Ornithological Dictionary, or Synopsis of British Birds," and soon after his "Testacea Britannica," or "Natural History of British Shells," illustrated. Both of these works are highly esteemed. Montague was a member of the Linnæan Society of London. Died in 1815.

Montague, (JOHN,) Earl of Sandwich, an English statesman, born in London in 1718. He was first lord of the admiralty in 1749 and 1750, and obtained the same office in 1763. He supported the administration of Lord North, under whom he served as first lord of the admiralty from 1771 to 1782. He was more deficient in principle than in capacity. Died in 1792.

Mon'ta-gue, (WILLIAM LEWIS,) an American educator, born at Belchertown, Massachusetts, April 6, 1831. He graduated at Amherst College in 1855, and after 1862 held the professorship of modern languages in that institution. His publications include Spanish and Italian grammars, "Introduction to Italian Literature," and other works.

Montaigne, mŏn-tān', de, [Fr. pron. deh mŏn'tāñ',] (MICHEL Eyquem—à'kŏn',) a celebrated French philosopher and essayist, born at the château de Montaigne, in Périgord, on the 28th of February, 1533. His father, who was one of the noblesse, placed him, while very young, under the tuition of masters who were ignorant of French, and who conversed with him only in Latin, which thus became his natural language. At the age of thirteen he had finished his studies at a college of Bordeaux. Having studied law, he became a judge at Bordeaux about 1554. In 1565 or 1566 he married, par convenance, Françoise de la Chassaigne. In 1580 he produced his celebrated "Essays," which have enjoyed an almost unparalleled popularity. Soon after that date he made a tour in Germany, Italy, etc., of which he wrote a Journal. He often visited Paris, in order to perform his duties as gentleman of the king's chamber. From 1581 to 1585 he was mayor of Bordeaux. During the civil war of the League his impartial moderation did not exempt him from danger and persecution. He died in September, 1592. "The Essays of Montaigne," says Hallam, "make in several respects an epoch in literature, less on account of their real importance than of their influence on the taste and opinions of Europe. . . . No prose writer of the sixteenth century has been so generally read, nor, probably, given so much delight. Whatever may be our estimate of Montaigne as a philosopher,—a name which he was far from arrogating,—there will be but one opinion of the felicity and brightness of his genius." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") "The author of these 'Essais,'" says Leo Joubert, "is certainly the most independent spirit that ever existed,—independent without revolt, and detached from the systems of others without having any system of his own. . . . We recognize in his 'Essays' a nature well endowed, not heroic, perhaps, but generous, exquisitely sensible, not aspiring to the sublime, capable of devotion, and incapable of a base act,—in fine, a model of what we may call average virtue," (la vertu moyenne.) ("Nouvelle Biographie Générale.") Sprightly humour, independence, naïveté, and originality are the characteristics of his mind; and his style is admired for its graceful simplicity. His works are highly seasoned with his own individuality, and afford much insight into his character.

"The Essays," says Emerson, "are an entertaining soliloquy on every random topic that comes into his head,—treating everything without ceremony, yet with masculine sense. There have been men with deeper insight, but, one would say, never a man with such abundance of thoughts: he is never dull, never insincere, and has the genius to make the reader care for all that he cares for. . . . This book of Montaigne the world has endorsed by translating it into all tongues and printing seventy-five editions of it in Europe,—and that, too, a circulation somewhat chosen, namely, among courtiers, soldiers, princes, men of the world, and men of wit and generosity." Montalembert, de, deh mŏn'tă'lŏn'bair', (CHARLES FORBES,) COMTE, a distinguished statesman, orator, and political writer, of French extraction, born in London in 1810, was a son of Marc René Anne Marie, noticed below. His mother was Miss Forbes, a Scottish lady.

He studied in Paris, and in 1830 became associated with Lamennais and Lacordaire as editor of "L'Avenir," in which post he was conspicuous as an eloquent champion of democracy and the Catholic Church. He entered the Chamber of Peers in 1831, and married, in 1843, Mademoiselle de Mérode, a Belgian lady. Devoted to the Liberal Catholic party, of which he was regarded as the most eminent leader, he was an earnest advocate of religious toleration, popular rights, and general education. He was a member of the Constituent Assembly in 1848, and in 1849 was elected to the Legislative Assembly, in which he opposed Victor Hugo in several brilliant efforts of oratory, especially during the debate on the revision of the constitution, in June, 1851. He was elected to the French Academy in 1852, and was a member of the legislative body from 1852 to 1857, during which period he represented the opposition almost alone. In 1858 he was condemned to a fine, and imprisonment for six months, for a political essay entitled "A Debate on India in the English Parliament;" but the penalties were not actually inflicted. He published, among other works, a "History of Saint Elizabeth of Hungary," (1836,) "On Vandalism and Catholicism in Art," (1839,) "The Political Future of England," (1855,) "The Monks of the West, from Saint Benedict to Saint Bernard," (1860,) and "The Free Church in the Free State," ("L'Église libre dans l'État libre," 1863.) He sympathized with the Unionists in the American civil war. In a letter to an English friend, dated December, 1869, he wrote, "Temporal despotism has faded away in a most unexpected manner; and I sincerely hope spiritual despotism will follow, sooner or later. . . . I am more convinced than ever that freedom in the sphere of religion, still more than in that of politics, is the vital condition of truth." A great sensation was produced by his letter dated February 28, 1870, in which he protested—almost with his latest breath—against the dogma of papal infallibility, and those ultramontanes "who have immolated justice and truth, reason and history, in one great holocaust to the idol they have raised up for themselves at the Vatican." Died in March, 1870.

Montalembert, de, (MARC RENÉ,) MARQUIS, a French general and distinguished military engineer, born at Angoulême in 1714. His family was noble, and had produced several distinguished captains. He entered the army in 1732, and was admitted into the Academy of Sciences in 1747. In the Seven Years' war (1756–63) he was attached to the staff of the Russian and Swedish armies, of whose operations he rendered an official account to the French ministry. He published in 1776 an extensive and important work, named "Perpendicular Fortification, or the Defensive Art superior to the Offensive," (11 vols.) He wrote several memoirs inserted in the "Collection" of the Academy, and other works, in prose and verse. Died in 1800.

Montecuccoli, mon-tà-kook'ko-lee, written also Montecucculi, (RAIMONDO,) COUNT, one of the greatest military commanders of his time, was born at Modena, in Italy, in 1608. Having entered the Austrian service, he distinguished himself in the campaign of 1637 against the Swedes; but he was subsequently defeated by the Swedish general Bannér, (1639,) and made prisoner. He was released after two years' captivity, and in 1664 gained a signal victory over the Turks at Saint Gothard, for which he was made lieutenant-general. He was sent in 1673 to oppose the celebrated Turenne; but, although consummate skill was displayed by both generals in their manœuvres, no decisive battle was fought. Montecucculi regarded this his last campaign as the most glorious of all, since he had encountered Turenne and Condé without being defeated. He died in 1681, leaving a "Treatise on the Art of War," which is highly esteemed. He was a liberal patron of learning, and was one of the founders of the Academy of Naturalists at Vienna. He had been created by the King of Spain a knight of the golden fleece, and obtained from him the principality of Amalfi.

Montenault. See Monthenault.

Montépin, de, dẹh mòn'tā'păn', (Xavier Aymon,) a French novelist, born in Haute-Saône about 1820. He produced several successful novels, one of which was condemned in a court of law as subversive of good morals.

Montereau, (Pierre.) See Pierre de Montereau.

Montesinos, mon-tā-see'nŏs, (Fernando,) a Spanish historian, born at Osuña, wrote a "History of Ancient Peru," which has been translated by Ternaux-Compans into French, under the title of "Mémoires historiques de l'ancien Pérou," (1849.) Died about 1660.

See Prescott, "History of the Conquest of Peru," vols. i. and ii.

Montespan, mon'tẹs-păn', de, [Fr. pron. dẹh mòn'-tĕs'pòn', (Françoise Athénais de Rochechouart—dẹh rosh'shoo-ăr',) Marquise, a French lady, of extraordinary personal beauty, born in 1641, was a daughter of the Duc de Mortemart. She was married in 1663 to the Marquis de Montespan. She afterwards succeeded Mademoiselle de la Vallière as mistress of Louis XIV. She bore the king eight children, among whom were the Duc de Maine, Louis César, the Comte de Vexin, and the Comte de Toulouse, besides two sons who died young. Died in 1707.

Montesquieu, mon'tĕs'ke-uh', Baron, a grandson of the following, was born in 1755. He served as an officer, with distinction, in the United States, (1779–81.) In 1792 he became a royalist émigré. He passed many years in England, where he died about 1824.

Montesquieu, mòn'tẹs-kū', de, [Fr. pron. dẹh mòn'-tĕs'ke-uh',] or, more fully, De la Brède et (dẹh lă brĕd à) de Montesquieu, (Charles de Secondat—dẹh seh-kòn'dă',) Baron, a brilliant, original, and popular French author, was born of a noble family near Bordeaux on the 18th of January, 1689. In his childhood he formed habits of intense application to study, and became an insatiable reader. He has declared that he never felt a sorrow which an hour's reading would not dissipate or relieve. Having been educated for the law, he became a conseiller, or judge, in the parliament of Bordeaux in 1714, and président à mortier of the same in 1716. The favourite studies of his mature powers were historical and moral sciences.

In 1721 he acquired a rather sudden celebrity by his "Persian Letters," a work which combines the attractions of romance with the resources of rational philosophy, and presents profound and luminous views of commerce, law, and social phenomena. Its prodigious success was due partly to its spirited, keen, and witty satire on French manners, and its brilliant, piquant style, full of happy reticences and unexpected contrasts. In 1726 he sold his office of president, and in 1728 was admitted into the French Academy. He then began a journey, in which he visited nearly all the countries of Europe. He passed two years in England, and was chosen a Fellow of the Royal Society. In 1734 he produced an admired work, "Considerations on the Causes of the Grandeur and Decadence of the Romans," the most complete essay that had appeared on that subject. He afterwards devoted fourteen years to the composition of his greatest work, "The Spirit of Laws," ("L'Esprit des Lois," 1748,) which excited almost universal admiration. In eighteen months it ran through twenty-two editions. In this arduous enterprise of exploring the labyrinths of history and political science he was in advance of his age as an advocate of liberty and humanity. In reference to this work, Voltaire said, "The human race had lost its titles; Montesquieu found and restored them." He died in Paris in February, 1755. He had married Mademoiselle de Lartigues in 1715. His personal character was in a high degree amiable and estimable.

Montesquiou, de, dẹh mòn'tĕs'ke-oo', (Pierre,) Comte d'Artagnan, a French general, born at the château of Armagnac in 1645. He commanded the right wing at the battle of Malplaquet, (1709,) soon after which he became a marshal of France. Died in 1725.

Montesquiou-Fezensac, de, dẹh mòn'tĕs'ke-oo' fẹh'zòn'zăk', (Ambroise Anatole Augustin,) Count, a French general and poet, born in Paris in 1788, was a grandson of Anne Pierre, noticed below. Died in 1878.

Montesquiou-Fezensac, de, (Anne Pierre,) Marquis, a French general and writer, born in Paris in 1739. He was admitted to the French Academy in 1784, and supported the popular cause in the Revolution. He commanded the army which conquered Savoy in 1792. Died in 1798.

See "Histoire de la Maison Montesquiou," Paris, 1847.

Montesquiou-Fezensac, de, (François Xavier Marc Antoine,) Abbé, a French ecclesiastic, born near Auch in 1757. He was a deputy from the clergy of Paris to the States-General in 1789, and was twice elected president of the National Assembly. During the reign of terror he took refuge in England, and, after the second restoration, was made a duke, and received the title of minister of state. Died in 1832.

Montesson, de, dẹh mòn'tă'sòn', (Charlotte Jeanne Béraud—bā'rō',) Marquise, born in Paris in 1737, was married in 1773 to Louis Philippe, Duke of Orléans. She was the author of numerous poems and dramas. Died in 1806.

Monteth. See Monteith, (Robert.)

Monteverde, mon-tā-vĕr'dā, (Claudio,) a celebrated Italian composer, born at Cremona about 1565. He introduced several great improvements into the science of music, one of which was the employment of double discords. His works include sacred music, operas, and madrigals. The last-named are especially admired. In 1613 he was appointed chapel-master of Saint Mark, at Venice. Died in 1649.

Montez. See Lola Montez.

Mon-te-zu'ma I., called also Moctheuzoma, Aztec emperor of Mexico, ascended the throne about 1437. Before this event he had been an eminent general. He extended the boundaries of his dominions by the conquest of several adjacent nations. He was a powerful and despotic monarch, and multiplied human sacrifices. Died about 1470.

Montezuma II., the last Aztec emperor of Mexico, was born about 1470. He was elected sovereign in 1502 for his superior merit as a warrior and a priest. When his election was announced to him, he was in the act of sweeping the stairs of the great temple Teocalli. In the former part of his reign he waged war with success against several peoples, and extended the limits of the empire. He offended his subjects by his haughty deportment, and oppressed them by the imposition of grievous taxes which were required to support his sumptuous style of living. In 1519 his empire was invaded by Cortez, against whom he employed a temporizing policy. He sent him a magnificent present, but forbade him to approach the capital. "This was to reveal," says Prescott, "both his wealth and his weakness." Cortez entered the city of Mexico, without resistance, in November, 1519, and found a hospitable reception. To secure himself against contingencies, the audacious Spaniard next seized Montezuma and held him as a hostage. His captors tried to convert him to the Roman Catholic religion, but without success. In compliance with the demand of Cortez, he formally recognized the supremacy of the emperor Charles V., to whom he sent an immense quantity of gold as tribute. In May, 1520, Cortez absented himself from the capital to fight his rival Narvaez, and during his absence the Mexicans revolted against the Spaniards. Montezuma was persuaded or compelled by Cortez to address his subjects and try to appease the tumult. He was assailed with missiles by the insurgents, was wounded, and died in June, 1520. "Stately and decorous," says Prescott, "he was careful of his own dignity, and might be said to be as great an 'actor of majesty' among the barbarian potentates of the New World as Louis XIV. was among the polished princes of Europe. . . . Montezuma's amiable and inoffensive manners, together with his liberality,—the most popular of virtues with the vulgar,—made him generally beloved by the Spaniards."

Montfaucon, de, dẹh môn'fō'kôn', [Lat. MONTEFALCO'NIUS,] (BERNARD,) an eminent French antiquary and philologist, born in Languedoc in 1655, was a member of the congregation of Benedictines of Saint-Maur. Having visited Italy in 1698, he published, after his return, his "Diarium Italicum," an account of the libraries of Italy, "Palæographia Græca," a treatise on the origin and progress of Greek letters, "Antiquity Explained and Represented in Figures," (10 vols. fol., 1719, in French and Latin,) and "The Monuments of the French Monarchy," (5 vols., 1729.) He also published excellent editions of Saint Chrysostom and other Greek writers. He was a member of the Academy of Inscriptions. Died in 1741.

Montferrat, de, dẹh môn'fẹ'rä', (BONIFACE,) MARQUIS, was a brother of Conrad, King of Jerusalem. He became King of Thessalonica in 1183, and was chosen the chief of the fifth or fourth crusade in 1202. He was an able commander, and contributed greatly to the conquest of Constantinople in 1204. Died in 1207.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Montferrat, de, (GUILLAUME,) MARQUIS, called THE GREAT, was born in 1243, and began to reign in 1254. He was a turbulent prince and continually engaged in war with the neighbouring states. He married Beatrix, a daughter of Alfonso X. of Castile, in 1271. Having been taken prisoner in 1290, he was confined in an iron cage, and died in 1292.

Montferrier, de, dẹh môn'fẹ're-ā', (ALEXANDRE ANDRÉ VICTOR SARRAZIN,) a French mathematician, born in Paris in 1792. He published, besides other works, a "Dictionary of Mathematical Sciences, Pure and Applied," (3 vols., 1834–40.) Died March 13, 1863.

Montfleury, môn'fluh'rẹ', the literary name of ANTOINE Jacob, a French actor and dramatist, born in 1640. He was an active rival of Molière, and left sixteen rather coarse, but very effective, comedies.

Montfleury, de, dẹh môn'fluh'rẹ', (JEAN LE PETIT,) a French poet, born at Caen in 1698; died in 1777.

Montfort, COUNT DE. See JOHN, Duke of Brittany.

Montfort, mônt'fọrt, de, [Fr. pron. dẹh môn'fọr',] (SIMON,) COUNT, a French nobleman and military commander, born about 1150, was conspicuous for his courage and for his cruelty in the wars against the Albigenses, (1208.) He was killed while besieging Toulouse, in 1218.

Montfort, de, (SIMON,) a son of the preceding, obtained at an early age the patronage of Henry III. of England, who made him Earl of Leicester and gave to him in marriage his sister, the Countess of Pembroke. He was afterwards appointed lieutenant-general in Gascony. In 1258, a rupture having occurred between Henry and his barons, the latter, headed by Montfort, compelled the king to consent to the regulations called the Provisions of Oxford, which threw the legislative and executive power into the hands of twenty-four barons. In 1264 a battle took place at Lewes, in Sussex, in which the royalists were defeated and the king taken prisoner. Montfort summoned a Parliament in 1265, in which, in addition to the two knights returned from every shire, representatives were sent from the boroughs; and in this way was founded the English House of Commons. In the battle of Evesham, the same year, Montfort was defeated and slain by the royal troops under Prince Edward.

Montgaillard, môn'gā'yär', (GUILLAUME HONORÉ ROQUES,) a historian, born near Toulouse in 1772. He wrote a "Chronological Review of the History of France, etc., 1787–1818," (1820,) which was once popular. Died in 1825.

Montgaillard, (JEAN GABRIEL MAURICE ROQUES,) a French adventurer and political writer, a brother of the preceding, was born at Toulouse in 1761. He was employed as a secret agent by the Bourbons and by their enemies. He published a "Memoir concerning the Treason of Pichegru," etc., and several other works. Died in 1841.

Montgelas, môn'zhẹh-lä', (MAXIMILIAN JOSEPH,) COUNT, a German statesman, of Savoyard extraction, born at Munich in 1759, was appointed minister of foreign affairs in 1799, minister of the interior in 1806, and minister of finance in 1809. Died in 1838.

Montglat, de, dẹh môn'glä', MARQUIS, a French author, of whom little is known. He left memoirs of the Thirty Years' War and of the campaigns before the Treaty of the Pyrenees. These memoirs are of much historical value.

Montgolfier, mônt-gôl'fe-ẹr, [Fr. pron. môn'gol'fe-ā',] (JACQUES ÉTIENNE,) an ingenious Frenchman, who invented the air-balloon, was born at or near Annonay (Ardèche) in 1745. After studying mathematics with success at Paris, he became an architect. At the request of his father, he quitted that profession in order to take charge of the paper-manufactory at Annonay. He invented new machines and more simple processes in this art. On reading Priestley's treatise "On Different Kinds of Air," he conceived the possibility of aerial navigation, and imparted the idea to his brother Joseph, who was as another self. Acting in concert and community, they contrived the means of realizing this project. After trying hydrogen gas and other fluids, they made the first public experiment at Annonay in June, 1783, and sent up a balloon about thirty-seven French feet in diameter, inflated with air rarefied by heat. This successful experiment made a great sensation, and was soon repeated at Paris. The brothers were admitted into the Academy of Sciences. Their balloons were called Montgolfières. The first who successfully used hydrogen gas in balloons was M. Charles. Montgolfier died in 1799. (See CHARLES, JACQUES ALEXANDRE.)

Montgolfier, (JOSEPH MICHEL,) an ingenious French mechanician, born at Annonay in 1740, was one of the inventors of the air-balloon. In his youth he assisted his father, who was a successful manufacturer of paper. In partnership with a brother, he carried on the same business at Voiron and Beaujeu. He had made several improvements in the fabrication of paper before his aerostatic experiments blazoned his name throughout Europe. (See the preceding article.) About 1792 he made a valuable improvement in the hydraulic ram. He also invented a hydraulic press and other mechanical instruments. He was a member of the Institute of France. Died in 1810.

Montgomerie, (ARCHIBALD WILLIAM.) See EGLINTON.

Montgomery, mọnt-gŭm'ẹ-re, (ALEXANDER,) a Scottish poet under the reign of James VI., was the author of an allegorical piece entitled "The Cherry and the Slae." Died about 1610.

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

Montgomery, mọnt-gŭm'ẹ-re, (GEORGE WASHINGTON,) a native of Spain, settled in America, where he published "Bernardo del Carpio," a historical romance, and translated into Spanish Irving's "Conquest of Granada." Died in 1841.

Montgomery, (Sir JAMES,) a Scottish politician, and a chief of the Covenanters. He was appointed lord justice clerk in 1689. "In parliamentary ability and eloquence," says Macaulay, "he had no superior among his countrymen except Sir John Dalrymple." He was turbulent and perfidious. In 1690 he joined the Jacobites in plotting against William III.

See MACAULAY, "History of England," vol. iii.

Montgomery, (JAMES,) a distinguished poet, born in Ayrshire, Scotland, in 1771, was the son of a Moravian preacher. He was sent at an early age to the Moravian school at Fulneck, in Yorkshire, where his progress was not very satisfactory to his teachers, as he spent the greater part of his time in reading and writing poetry, which was prohibited by the rules of the school. After leaving Fulneck, he resided for a time, as shopman in a book-store, in London, and in 1792 began to contribute political articles to the "Sheffield Register," edited by Mr. Joseph Gales. He founded in 1794 a reform journal, called the "Sheffield Iris," of which he was editor about thirty years. Several of his articles having been denounced as revolutionary, he was twice fined and imprisoned. He published in 1806 his "Wanderer of Switzerland," which was followed by "The West Indies," (1809,) "The World before the Flood," (1812,) and "The Pelican Island," (1827.) These poems are distinguished for depth and tenderness of feeling, elevated moral sentiment, and graceful description. He also wrote a number of hymns of great beauty, which enjoy extensive popularity. One of Mr. Montgomery's last works was a "History of Missionary Enterprise in the South Seas," (1830.) Died in 1854.

Montgomery, mont-gŭm'ẹ-re, (ROBERT,) an English divine and poet, born at Bath in 1807. He was the author of a poem entitled "The Omnipresence of the Deity," (1828,) which had great temporary success, eight editions being sold in as many months. He became in 1843 pastor of Percy Street Chapel, London. The extraordinary success of his poetry was chiefly to be ascribed to the nature of his subject and the favour of a large portion of the religious community. Died in 1855.

See MACAULAY, in the "Edinburgh Review" for April, 1830; "Autobiography of William Jerdan," vol. iv. chap. xvii.;

Montgomery, (WILLIAM R.,) an American officer, born in New Jersey, July 10, 1801, served in the Mexican war, became brigadier-general of volunteers in the Union army in 1861, and military commandant of Philadelphia in 1862. Died at Bristol, Pennsylvania, May 31, 1871.

Montgomery, mont-gŭm'ẹ-re, de, [Fr. pron. dẹh môn'gom're',] (GABRIEL,) a French nobleman, of Scottish extraction, born about 1530. Being present at a tournament given by Henry II. on the occasion of his daughter's marriage with the King of Spain, Montgomery was summoned by the French king to break a lance with him. He complied reluctantly, and had the misfortune to inflict a mortal wound on his antagonist. He subsequently went to England, where he became a Protestant, and, after his return to France in 1562, distinguished himself as a leader of the Huguenots in the civil war of the time. Being made prisoner by Marshal Matignon at the siege of Saint-Lo, in 1574, he was condemned to death and executed, by order of Catherine de Médicis. "The queen," says Sismondi, "had no great affection for Henry II., or cause to regret him; but she wished that a man should not be considered innocent after having, even by accident, caused the death of a king."

Montgon, de, dẹh môn'gôn', (CHARLES ALEXANDRE,) a French priest, born at Versailles in 1690. He entered the service of Philip V. of Spain, who sent him on a secret mission to the court of Paris. He published "Diplomatic Memoirs," (5 vols., 1742.) Died in 1770.

Monthenault or Montenault d'Égly, môn'tẹh'nō' dà'gle', (CHARLES PHILIPPE,) a French writer, born in Paris in 1696. His chief work is a "History of the French Kings of the Two Sicilies," (4 vols., 1741.) Died in 1749.

Monthion, de, dẹh môn'te'ôn', (FRANÇOIS GÉDÉON BAILLY,) COMTE, a French general, born in the Isle of Bourbon in 1776; died in 1850.

Montholon, de, dẹh môn'to'lôn', (CHARLES TRISTAN,) MARQUIS, a French general, born in Paris in 1782. He entered the army in 1798, and accompanied Napoleon in the subsequent campaigns in Italy, Austria, and Prussia. He was sent in 1811 on an important embassy to the archduke Ferdinand at Würzburg, and in 1814 was made general of brigade. He shared the emperor's exile at Saint Helena, and served him with unwearied fidelity till his death, being appointed by him executor of his will and keeper of part of his manuscripts. After his return to France, Montholon published, in conjunction with General Gourgaud, "Memoirs towards the History of France under Napoleon, dictated by Himself at Saint Helena," (1823.) He also wrote an "Account of the Captivity of Napoleon at Saint Helena," (1847.) Died in 1853.

Monti, mon'tee, (GIOVANNI BATTISTA,) an Italian poet, born at Bologna in 1688; died in 1766.

Monti, (GIUSEPPE,) an Italian botanist, born at Bologna in 1682. He published several botanical works Died at Bologna in 1760.

Monti, (RAFAELLE,) an Italian sculptor, born at Milan in 1818. Among his master-pieces may be named the "Veiled Vestal," the "Boy catching a Grasshopper," and the "Circassian Slave." He was an active supporter of the popular cause in 1847–48, after which he lived as an exile in London. Died October 16, 1881.

Monti, (VINCENZO,) a celebrated Italian poet, born near Ferrara in 1753. He studied in the university of that city, and began at an early age to write Latin and Italian poems. These compositions obtained for him the notice and patronage of Cardinal Borghese, who took Monti with him to Rome in 1778. He published in 1785 his tragedy of "Aristodemo," which was received with great favour. His poem entitled "Bassvilliana," (1793,) suggested by the murder of Hugo de Bassville, envoy of the French republic at Rome, had also great popularity, and passed through eighteen editions in six months. Upon the French invasion in 1796, Monti repaired to Milan, where, accommodating himself to the new order of things, he wrote in favour of the Revolution. Some of his writings, which originally contained bitter invectives against Napoleon, were now altered so as to transfer the abuse to the allied sovereigns. On the Russian invasion in 1799 he took refuge for a time in France, and, soon after his return, published his tragedy of "Caio Gracco," "La Mascheroniana," a poem on the death of his friend Mascheroni, and his beautiful and popular hymn beginning "Bell' Italia," etc. Monti became in 1803 professor of eloquence at Pavia, and on the coronation of Napoleon, in 1805, was appointed his historiographer. He filled this office rather as court poet than historian, and lavished a profusion of eulogistic verses on the emperor and his family. He was created by him a chevalier of the legion of honour and of the iron crown, and was chosen a member of the Institute of the kingdom of Italy. Died in 1828.

He was a deputy to the States-General in 1789, and was a prominent advocate of the aristocratic party. He repaired to London, where he edited an anti-revolutionary journal called the "Courrier de Londres." On his return to France, during the consulate, he modified or abandoned his royalist views. He was also for a time one of the editors of the "Constitutionnel." Having attached himself to the new dynasty on the revolution of July, he was made a peer in 1832. He wrote a work "On the French Monarchy from its Establishment to the Present Time." Died in 1838.

Montluc, de, dẹh mòn'lük', (BLAISE de Lasseran-Massencome—dẹh lâs'rôn' mă'sôn'kom',) SEIGNEUR, a French marshal, born in Gascony in 1501. He fought against the Imperialists commanded by the emperor Charles V., and assisted at the sieges of La Rochelle and Calais. In 1573 he was made a marshal by Henry III. He died in 1577, leaving "Memoirs of his Military Life," (1592,) which were praised by Henry IV. and often reprinted.

Montluc, de, (JEAN,) a bishop, the brother of the preceding, was born about 1508, and was distinguished by the favour of Francis I. and Henry II., who employed him in various embassies. He became Bishop of Valence in 1553 He is said to have been secretly attached to the Reformed religion; but he retained the favour of Catherine de Médicis. Died in 1579.

Montluc, de, (JEAN,) Seigneur de Balagni, and marshal of France, a natural son of the preceding, was born about 1545. After he had fought for the League against Henry IV., he entered the service of the latter, who made him a marshal of France in 1594. Died in 1603.

Montluca, mòn'lü'kâ', (JEAN ÉTIENNE,) a French mathematician, born at Lyons in 1725. He became a lawyer of Paris, and a noted linguist, was the friend of Lalande and D'Alembert, and filled important civil offices. He wrote a very important "History of Mathematics," (1758 et seq.,) and died in December, 1799.

Montmaur, de, dẹh mòn'mōr', (PIERRE,) a pedantic and witty Frenchman, born in Limousin or Le Quercy about 1564. He was professor of Greek in the Collége de France, and was notorious as a parasite. Died in 1648.

Montmorency. See LUXEMBOURG.

Montmorency or Montmorenci, mônt-mo-rẽn'se, [Fr. pron. mòn'mo'rôn'se',] the name of a noble French family, whose celebrity dates as far back as the eleventh century, and which has produced many famous princes, peers, and generals. Among them were six constables and eleven marshals of France.

Montmorency, de, dẹh mòn'mo'rôn'se', (ANNE,) DUC, Constable of France, born at Chantilly in 1493, was the first of his family that received the title of duke. He was made a marshal in 1522, and was taken prisoner at Pavía in 1525. In 1536, by skilful manœuvres, he defended Provence, which was invaded by Charles V. in person. He was appointed constable in 1538, and was chief minister of Francis I. from that date until 1541, when he fell into disgrace. Henry II. restored him to favour and power in 1547. Montmorency was defeated and made prisoner at the battle of Saint-Quentin, in 1557. The death of Henry II., in 1559, was fatal to his ambitious prospects, and opened the way for the accession to power of his rival the Duc de Guise. He fought for the Catholic party in the civil war, and in 1562 commanded at Dreux, where he gained the victory, but was made prisoner. He was mortally wounded at the battle of Saint-Denis, in 1567. He has been censured for austerity and excessive rigour, but had several great qualities.

Montmorency, de, (CHARLES,) a French general, who became a marshal of France in 1343. He fought against the English at Crécy in 1346. Died in 1381.

Montmorency, de, (CHARLOTTE MARGUERITE,) a French lady, born in 1594, was the sister of Duke Henri II. de Montmorency. She was married to Henri, Prince de Condé, about 1609. Her beauty made such an impression on the king, Henry IV., that her husband was alarmed, and conducted her to a foreign country. She was the mother of the great Condé, of the Prince of Conti, and of the Duchess of Longueville. Died in 1650.

See BAZIN, "Histoire de Louis XIII;" L'ESTOILE, "Mémoires," etc.

Montmorency, de, (HENRY I.,) DUC, the second son of Anne, noticed above, was styled COMTE DE DAMVILLE in his youth. He was a cousin of Admiral Coligni. At the battle of Dreux, in 1562, he took the Prince of Condé prisoner, and in 1566 obtained a marshal's bâton. He rendered important services to Henry IV., who appointed him Constable of France in 1593. Died in 1614. It is stated that a mutual passion was felt by him and Mary Queen of Scots, whom he followed to Scotland in 1561.

Montmorency, de, (HENRI II.,) DUC, a son of the preceding, was born at Chantilly in 1595. His valour, generosity, and name rendered him a great favourite with the court, the army, and the people. He commanded for Louis XIII. in the civil war against the Huguenots which began about 1620, and defeated the Duc de Rohan in 1628. For his victory over the Imperialists at Veillane, in 1629, he was made a marshal. Seduced by Gaston, a brother of Louis XIII. and heir-presumptive to the throne, and incited by enmity to Richelieu, he took arms against the government, and encountered the royal army at Castelnaudary in 1632. With too impetuous valour, he exposed himself at the head of his army, was wounded, and made prisoner. He was tried for treason, and beheaded in October, 1632. He left no issue, and the first ducal branch of the Montmorencies then became extinct. His sister was the mother of the great Prince de Condé and of the Duchesse de Longueville.

See DESORMEAUX, "Histoire de la Maison de Montmorency."

Montmorency, de, (MATHIEU I.,) was appointed Constable of France about 1130, and was the most powerful French seigneur of his time. He married first Aline, daughter of Henry I. of England, and secondly Alix or Adelaide, the widow of Louis le Gros and mother of Louis VII. of France. He died in 1160, leaving several children by his first wife.

See DESORMEAUX, "Histoire de la Maison de Montmorency."

Montmorency, de, (MATHIEU II.,) surnamed LE GRAND, a grandson of the preceding, was born about 1174. He contributed greatly to the victory of the French at Bouvines, in 1214. In 1218 he obtained the office of constable, which his talents and merits raised to be the highest office of the kingdom. The Constable of France was thenceforth ex officio commander-in-chief of the army. He had great influence in the reign of Louis VIII. and in that of his successor. He was nearly related to two emperors and six kings. His grand daughter married Louis de Bourbon, a great-great grandfather of Henry IV. Died in 1230.

See DESORMEAUX, "Histoire de la Maison de Montmorency."

Montpensier, de, dẹh môN′pôN′se-ā′, (Anne Marie Louise d'Orléans,) Duchesse, commonly called Mademoiselle, was born in Paris in 1627. She was the daughter of Gaston, Duke of Orléans, and cousin of Louis XIV. Of a bold and energetic character, she became a zealous adherent of the party of Condé in the wars of the Fronde. She rendered several important services to that faction, among which was the capture of the town of Orléans. About 1670 she was married to Count Lauzun. She died in 1693, leaving Memoirs which possess much interest.

See Voltaire, "Siècle de Louis XIV;" Saint-Simon, "Mémoires;" "Mademoiselle's Campaigns," in the "Atlantic Monthly" for July, 1858.

Montpensier, de, (Antoine Marie Philippe Louis d'Orléans,) Duc, a younger son of King Louis Philippe of France, was born at Neuilly in 1824. He served with distinction in Algeria in 1844 and 1845, obtained the rank of maréchal de camp in 1846, and married in that year Maria Luisa Fernanda de Bourbon, a sister of Isabella, Queen of Spain. In 1858 Queen Isabella gave him the rank of captain-general. He aspired to the vacant throne of Spain in 1869, and in 1870 he killed Prince Henry of Bourbon in a duel. Died February 4, 1890.

Montpensier, de, (Antoine Philippe d'Orléans,) Duc, a younger brother of King Louis Philippe of France, was born in 1775. He was arrested in April, 1793, and imprisoned until 1796. Died near London in 1807.

Montpensier, de, (Catherine Marie de Lorraine—dẹh lo′rȧn′,) Duchesse, a French lady, born in 1552, was a sister of Henri, Duc de Guise. She acted with the League, and fomented rebellion against Henry III. of France. Died in 1596.

Montpetit, de, dẹh môN′pẹh-te′, (Armand Vincent,) a French painter, born at Mâcon in 1713. He was the inventor of a method of painting which he called éludorique, (elydoric.) He published an account of his invention in a work entitled "Note intéressante sur les Moyens de conserver les Portraits peints à l'Huile," etc., (1776.) Died in 1800.

Montrose, mont-rōz′, (James Grahame,) Marquis of, a celebrated Scottish general, born at Edinburgh in 1612. Having finished his studies in France, after his return to Scotland he served for a time in the Presbyterian army; but he subsequently went over to the royalists. He was appointed by Charles I., in 1644, Marquis of Montrose, and commander-in-chief of the Scottish forces. He signally defeated the Covenanters at Tippermuir in 1644, also at Inverlochy and at Kilsyth in 1645; but his army was surprised and totally defeated by General Leslie at Philiphaugh in September, 1645. Montrose soon after went to Germany, where he was received with great distinction by the Austrian emperor and made a marshal of the empire. Having collected a small but ill-organized force, he returned to Scotland in 1650, but was soon after defeated and taken prisoner. He was executed, without a trial, at Edinburgh, in May, 1650.

Montucci, mon-toot′chee, (Antonio,) an Italian philologist, born at Sienna in 1762, became in 1785 professor of the English language in the Tolomei College, and subsequently of Italian at Berlin and Dresden. He died in 1829, leaving unfinished a Chinese Dictionary.

Montucla, môN′tü′klȧ′, (Jean Étienne,) a French mathematician, born at Lyons in 1725. Having studied philology and natural science at the Jesuits' College at Lyons, he visited Paris, where he became associate editor of the "Gazette de France" and formed an intimacy with Diderot, D'Alembert, and other savants of the time. In 1764 he accompanied Turgot to Cayenne, as first secretary and astronomer to the expedition. After his return he was appointed royal censor of mathematical books and commissioner of the royal buildings. He was a member of the Academy of Sciences at Berlin, and of the Institute of France. His most important work is his "History of Mathematics," (1758,) which was completed by Lalande. He also wrote a "History of the Researches for Determining the Quadrature of the Circle," and several other treatises. Died in 1799.

Moore, (BENJAMIN,) an American clergyman, born on Long Island in 1748, became Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the diocese of New York. Died in 1816.

Moore, (CLEMENT C.,) LL.D., son of the preceding, was born in New York in 1779. He was appointed in 1821 professor of Hebrew and Greek literature in the Protestant Episcopal Seminary in New York. He published a "Hebrew-and-English Lexicon," and other works. Died July 10, 1863.

Moore, mōr, (EDWARD,) an English littérateur, born in Berkshire in 1712. He was the author of "Fables for the Female Sex," which had great popularity, and "The Gamester," a tragedy, which was also very successful. He was one of the editors of "The World," a literary journal having among its contributors Horace Walpole, Soame Jenyns, and Lord Chesterfield. Died in 1757.

See WALPOLE, "Letters;" JOHNSON and CHALMERS, "English Poets."

Moore, (EDWARD M.,) M.D., an American surgeon, born at Rahway, New Jersey, July 15, 1814, graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1838. In 1838, in conjunction with Dr. C. L. Pennock, of Philadelphia, he performed a series of original experiments on the physiological action of the heart, which excited much attention among physiologists. About 1840 he removed to Rochester, New York, where he soon acquired a high reputation in his profession. For many years he has filled the chair of surgery in the medical college at Buffalo.

Moore, (FRANK,) son of Jacob Bailey, noticed below, has published "Songs and Ballads of the American Revolution," the "Rebellion Record, a Diary of American Events," (11 vols., 1861–68,) and several other works.

Moore, (JOHN,) an English prelate, born at Gloucester in 1733. He became Bishop of Bangor in 1776, and Archbishop of Canterbury in 1783. Died in 1805.

Moore, (Sir JOHN,) a celebrated British general, born at Glasgow in 1761, was the eldest son of Dr. John Moore, noticed above. He entered the army at the age of fifteen, and was sent in 1794 to Corsica, where he acted in conjunction with Paoli, and was conspicuous for his courage in the attack on Fort Morello and at the siege of Calvi. As general of brigade, he served under Sir Ralph Abercrombie in the West Indies in 1796, and in 1798 assisted in quelling the Irish rebellion. He accompanied General Abercrombie to Egypt in 1801, and was severely wounded at the battle of Alexandria. He was made a knight of the Bath on his return to England, and, after various services in Sicily and Sweden, was created lieutenant-general, and sent in 1808 to Spain to unite with the forces in the north against the French. On the news of the defeat of the Spanish troops along the northern frontier, and of the numerous French armies approaching, he made a rapid retreat to Coruña, which, being performed in the depth of winter, was attended with great suffering. On the 16th of January, 1809, an engagement took place at Corunna, in which the English claimed the victory but lost their brave commander. His death has been commemorated by the poet Wolfe in a beautiful and popular ode, which Byron pronounced the most perfect in the English language.

Moore, mōr, (THOMAS,) a celebrated Irish poet, born in Dublin in 1779. He entered Trinity College at an early age, but, being a Catholic, he was unable to obtain any of the university honours or offices. He afterwards studied law at the Middle Temple, London. He published in 1801 his translation of the "Odes of Anacreon," which was very successful, and was followed by "The Poetical Works of the Late Thomas Little," (1802.) In 1804 he visited the United States of America, on the society and institutions of which he made many satirical comments in his "Odes and Epistles," (1806.) His other principal works are "Lalla Rookh," (1817,) an Oriental poem, "The Twopenny Post-Bag, by Thomas Brown, Jun.," (1813,) a witty satire directed against the Tories, which had great popularity, "The Fudge Family in Paris," (1818,) "Loves of the Angels," (1823,) and "Irish Melodies," (1834.) In 1830 he published a "Life of Lord Byron," his most important prose work, which, although written entirely from the stand-point of friendship, has been highly commended by the critics. He also wrote a "Life of Sheridan," (1825,) "The Epicurean," (1827,) a prose romance, and a "History of Ireland," (1835.) Of his poems, his "Lalla Rookh" and "Irish Melodies" enjoy the highest reputation. The former, though deficient in the higher qualities of poetry, is characterized by exquisite melody of versification and splendid imagery, and in its moral tone affords a striking contrast to the frivolity and licentiousness of his earlier productions. It obtained extraordinary popularity, and was translated into many languages, including Persian. Hazlitt, in his critique on Moore, says that "his is the poetry of the toilette, of the saloon, of the fashionable world,—not the poetry of nature, of the heart, or of human life. His imagination may dally with insect beauties, but it should not attempt to span the great outlines of nature, or keep pace with the sounding march of events, or grapple with the strong fibres of the human heart." Died February 26, 1852.

Moosa, Mousa, or Musa, moo'sȧ, third son of Bayazeed I., was born at Brusa about 1376. He was made prisoner with his father by Tamerlane after the battle of Angora. Being afterwards appointed by the latter governor of the Ottoman provinces of Asia Minor, he carried on a war against his elder brother Solyman, whose capital Adrianople he took in 1404, thus becoming master of the European part of the Ottoman empire. In 1412 he besieged Constantinople, but, having been forced to retire, he was taken prisoner, and strangled by order of Mahomet I.

Moosa, Mousa, or Musa, Ibn, ĭbn moo'sȧ, (Aboo-Abdallah-Mohammed, ȧ'bōō ȧb-dȧl'lȧh mo-hȧm'mĕd,) an Arabian mathematician, was the author of a treatise on algebra entitled "Al Jebr e al Mokabalah." He is said to have been the first of his countrymen who wrote on that science; and Europe is indebted to him for its introduction and its name.

Moosa-Ibn-Noseyr, moo'sȧ ĭb'n no-sār', (or no-sīr',) (Aboo-Abd-er-Rahman, ȧ'bōō ȧb'dĕr rȧh'mȧn,) a celebrated Arab conqueror, was born at Mecca about 660 A.D. He was appointed in 703 Viceroy of Africa, and, having subjected the northern part of that country, from Tripoli to Morocco, he turned his arms against Spain. In conjunction with his lieutenant Târik, he took Seville, Merida, Saragossa, and other cities of Southern and Central Spain, to which he subsequently added the most important towns of Catalonia. Among other articles of great value of which he had possessed himself was the emerald table called the table of Solomon, taken at Medina-Celi. Moosa, having been summoned to Damascus by the caliph, presented to him this table, and, on his expressing his surprise that it should have three legs of emerald and one of gold, Moosa replied that he had found it in this condition. Tarik, however, immediately exposed the falsehood of his rival by producing the fourth leg of the table. For this offence he was condemned to a heavy fine by Solyman, who afterwards caused his son Abd-el-azeez to be assassinated. Moosa died in obscurity in 718.

Mordaunt, mor'dant, (CHARLES,) Earl of Peterborough, a famous English general, of chivalrous and eccentric character, born in 1658, was the son and heir of John, Lord Mordaunt. He first appears prominently in history as a staunch Whig and opponent of James II. In 1689 he was created Earl of Monmouth and placed at the head of the treasury, but the next year he retired from that office, which was ill suited to his volatile and generous character. He afterwards inherited the title of his uncle, the Earl of Peterborough. During the war of the Spanish succession he commanded an English army of 5000 men which arrived in Spain in 1705 and performed a series of brilliant exploits, among which was the capture of Barcelona and Valencia, (1706.) Thwarted in his plans by the archduke Charles of Austria, he obtained leave to retire from the army, and was recalled to England in 1707. Through hostility to Marlborough, he supported the Tories in the political contests which ensued, and after the accession of George I. was consequently excluded from office. He died in 1735. His second wife was Anastasia Robinson, a celebrated singer and actress. In the opinion of Macaulay, he was "the most extraordinary character of that age, the King of Sweden not excepted. His fertility and activity of mind were almost beyond belief. He loved to dictate six or seven letters at once. He was a kind friend, a generous enemy, and a thorough gentleman. But his splendid talents and virtues were rendered almost useless to his country by his levity, his restlessness, his irritability, his morbid craving for novelty and excitement." ("Essays.")

More, (HANNAH,) an English writer, whose moral and religious works enjoyed great popularity in her time, was born at Stapleton, near Bristol, in 1745. She published in 1773 a pastoral drama, entitled "The Search after Happiness," and in 1774 "The Inflexible Captive," a tragedy, which introduced her to the notice of Garrick, Dr. Johnson, and other eminent men of that period, by whom she was greatly esteemed for the excellence of her character. She was the author of several other dramas, which were very favourably received; but, owing to her convictions of the immoral tendency of the stage, she abandoned dramatic writing, and, while her popularity was still at its height, devoted herself to compositions of a moral and religious character. Among the principal of these we may name "Thoughts on the Manners of the Great," (1788,) "Strictures on the Modern System of Female Education," (1799,) "Hints towards Forming the Character of a Young Princess," (1805,) written for Charlotte, Princess of Wales, "Cœlebs in Search of a Wife," (1809,) and several contributions to the "Cheap Repository Tracts," one of which is entitled "The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain." Died in 1833.

More, [Lat. MO'RUS,] (HENRY,) an English divine and philosophical writer, born in Lincolnshire in 1614. He studied at Christ's College, Cambridge, of which he was chosen a Fellow. He refused several high preferments in the church, and passed his life in retirement, devoted chiefly to the study of philosophy. He was the author of "Psychozoia, or the Life of the Soul," (1640,) "Enchiridium Metaphysicum," "Conjectura Cabalistica," "The Mystery of Godliness," "Discourse on the Immortality of the Soul," and other works, in which he favours the Platonic system. He was a man of fine genius, profound learning, and rare excellence of character. He was one of the first Fellows of the Royal Society, and was a friend and correspondent of Descartes. Died in 1687.

More, (JAMES.) See MOORE.

More, [Lat. MO'RUS; It. and Sp. MO'RO,] (Sir THOMAS,) an eminent English wit, philosopher, and statesman, born in London in 1480, was a son of Sir John More, a judge of the court of king's bench. He received the first rudiments of his education at Saint Anthony's School, London, where he learned Latin. At the age of fifteen he became a page in the house of Cardinal Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury and prime minister, who was much pleased with the wit of young More and predicted that he would prove "a marvellous man." In 1497 he entered the University of Oxford, where he studied Greek as a pupil of Grocyn and formed an intimate and lasting friendship with Erasmus. He gained distinction at Oxford as a writer of English and of Latin verses. Having left college, he studied law at Lincoln's Inn. "He manifested," says Mackintosh, "a predilection for monastic life, and is said to have practised some of those austerities and self-inflictions which prevail among the gloomier and more stern orders." He resolved, indeed, at one time to turn monk, and actually became a lay brother of the Carthusian convent (the Charter-House) in London, where he is said to have passed several years, devoting himself at the same time to the study of the classics, the French language, and music. He afterwards entertained thoughts of becoming a priest; but on further reflection, and influenced perhaps by the general corruption of the priestly orders, he abandoned his design. In the words of Erasmus, "Maluit maritus esse castus quam sacerdos impurus," ("he preferred to be a chaste husband rather than an impure priest.") About 1502 he married Jane Colt, the eldest daughter of a gentleman of Essex. He had a slight preference for her younger sister, but was so good-natured that he sacrificed his inclination, that he might not wound the feelings of the eldest. This union proved very happy, but his wife died a few years after her marriage, leaving him a son and three daughters, of whom Margaret, the eldest, inherited the features, goodness, and genius of her father. His graceful and varied learning was only surpassed by his sprightly, inexhaustible wit. "With him," says Erasmus, "you might imagine yourself in the Academy of Plato." He attained great eminence at the bar, and about 1502 became an under-sheriff of London,—i.e. a judge of the sheriff's court. He appears to have been the first Englishman that cultivated oratory with any great success. "He is," says Mackintosh, "the first person in our history distinguished by the faculty of public speaking, and remarkable for the successful employment of it in Parliament against a lavish grant of money to the crown." He was elected to Parliament about 1504, and, by persuading the Commons not to grant a supply to Henry VII. on the occasion of the marriage of his daughter, deeply offended that king. More had in consequence resolved to leave the country; but the death of Henry relieved him from all apprehensions.

Having lost his first wife, he married a widow named Alice Middleton. In 1513 he wrote a "History of Richard III.," which, says Hallam, "appears to me the first example of good English language, pure and perspicuous, well chosen, without vulgarisms or pedantry." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") He was sent on a mission to Flanders in 1514, and about that date became a favourite of Henry VIII., who not only consulted him in affairs of state, but preferred him as the companion of his amusements and convivial hours. In 1516 he produced his famous Platonic fiction of "Utopia," (in Latin,) describing an imaginary commonwealth in the island of Utopia, the citizens of which had all things in common. He resigned the office of under-sheriff in 1519, was appointed treasurer of the exchequer in 1521, and chosen Speaker of the House of Commons in 1523. He gave proof of his firmness and independence by his answer to Cardinal Wolsey, who demanded a very great subsidy for the king. About 1523 More began to write tracts against Luther.

In October, 1529, he was appointed lord chancellor in place of Cardinal Wolsey. Although the Protestants were persecuted while he held that office, it would appear that he was not responsible for the persecution. "It is a sufficient proof of his clemency," says Erasmus, "that while he was chancellor no man was put to death for these pestilent dogmas."*

* This statement is contradicted by Froude, who says, "Soon after the seals changed hands, the Smithfield fires recommenced: and, the chancellor acting in concert with them, the bishops resolved to obliterate, in these edifying spectacles, the recollection of their general infirmities." He afterwards cites the case of Bainham, who was burned in April, 1532, a short time before More resigned the office of chancellor. The account of Bainham's execution appears to rest upon the single testimony of Foxe, who, though generally trustworthy, might possibly be mistaken, especially when he was obliged to depend wholly on the statements of others. He was but a boy when Bainham's death took place. More, whose word is not to be lightly set aside, expressly denies in his "Apology" (published the next year) that he was guilty of any cruel treatment of the heretics. If the denial was false, there were doubtless many then living who could prove it to be so. It appears, however, never to have been contradicted. How far he was responsible for the acts of the bishops it is difficult to say.

Suitors were astonished at the contrast between the affable More and the haughty Cardinal Wolsey. Sir Thomas resigned the great seal in May, 1532, because his conscience refused to sanction the divorce of Queen Catherine and the second marriage of the king. "Henry had tried every possible means to obtain at least the appearance of his spontaneous approbation." (Mackintosh.) In 1533 he wrote a work called "The Apology of Sir Thomas More."

Having declined to take the oath by which he was required to acknowledge the validity of the king's marriage with Anne Boleyn, he was committed to the Tower in April, 1534. After he had been in prison more than a year, he was charged with denying the king's supremacy as the head of the Church; and, his answers not having been found satisfactory, he was pronounced guilty of treason, and was beheaded on the 6th of July, 1535. "The scaffold had been awkwardly erected, and shook as he placed his foot upon the ladder. 'See me safe up,' he said to Kingston; 'for my coming down I can shift for myself.' . . . The executioner offered to tie his eyes. 'I will cover them myself,' he said; and, binding them in a cloth which he had brought with him, he knelt, and laid his head upon the block. The fatal stroke was about to fall, when he signed for a moment's delay, while he moved aside his beard. 'Pity that should be cut,' he murmured: 'that has not committed treason.' With which strange words,—the strangest, perhaps, ever uttered at such a time,—the lips most famous through Europe for eloquence and wisdom closed forever." (Froude's "History of England," chap. ix.) Alluding to his behaviour on the scaffold, Addison remarks, "The innocent mirth which had been so conspicuous in his life did not forsake him at the last. His death was of a piece with his life; there was nothing in it new, forced, or affected. He did not look upon the severing his head from his body as a circumstance which ought to produce any change in the disposition of his mind; and, as he died in a fixed and settled hope of immortality, he thought any unusual degree of sorrow and concern improper." ("Spectator," No. 349.) According to the account of his great-grandson, More "was of a middle stature, well proportioned, of a pale complexion, his hair of chestnut colour, his eyes gray, his countenance mild and cheerful."

Moreau, (Hégésippe,) a French poet, born in Paris in 1810, was the author of songs, elegies, and satires, of considerable merit, and a prose work entitled "The Mistletoe of the Oak," ("Le Gui de Chêne.") He died, in great poverty, in 1838.

Moreau, (Jacob Nicolas,) a French writer, born at Saint-Florentin in 1717, was appointed historiographer of France under Louis XVI. He wrote a "Discourse on the History of France," "Duties of a Prince," and other works. Died in 1803.

Moreau, (Jean Baptiste,) a French musician and composer, born at Angers in 1656, was patronized at the court of Louis XIV., and was employed by Racine to compose the choruses for his "Athalie" and "Esther." Died in 1733.

Moreau, (Jean Michel,) a French engraver and designer, born in Paris in 1741, became draughtsman of the royal cabinet, and a member of the Academy of Painting. He executed one hundred and sixty plates for the "History of France," and upwards of one hundred for editions of Voltaire and Molière. Died in 1814.

Moreau, (Jean Victor,) one of the most eminent generals of France, was born at Morlaix, in Brittany, August 11, 1763. He studied law, and was provost of law at Rennes just before the Revolution. In 1792 he enlisted in the republican army, and, as chef de bataillon, served under Dumouriez. He became a general of brigade in 1793, and a general of division in 1794. In the latter year he commanded with éclat the right wing of Pichegru's army, which conquered Holland. In the spring of 1796 he succeeded Pichegru as commander-in-chief of the army of the Rhine and Moselle, and opened the campaign which was the foundation of his military fame. His passage of the Rhine at Strasbourg was greatly applauded. He drove the Austrians back to the Danube, and then, finding his army outnumbered, after several indecisive actions he performed the famous and masterly retreat through the Black Forest, which was one of his chief exploits. He was suspended from the command in 1797 by the Directory, who probably suspected him of complicity in the defection of his friend Pichegru.

The reverses of the French having rendered his services necessary, he was appointed general-in-chief of the army of Italy in the spring of 1799. At the battle of Novi he had three horses killed under him, and made a skilful retreat, soon after which he was transferred to the command of the army of the Rhine. In the political crisis of 18th Brumaire, (November 9, 1799,) Moreau was in Paris, and consented to support Bonaparte in subverting the power of the Directory. Some suppose that if he had been less modest, or more ambitious, he might have acted the principal rôle in that great drama. The First Consul intrusted to Moreau the command of the army of Germany, and dictated to him a plan of the campaign, which the latter refused to adopt. "Moreau would not submit," says Alison, "to the indignity of acting as second in command to his former rival, and said, 'I have no notion of seeing a little Louis XIV. at the head of my army.'" ("History of Europe.")

After an angry discussion, he persisted in his own plan, and, while Bonaparte marched to the conquest of Italy, he invaded the valley of the Danube in May, 1800, with about 100,000 men. Between the 1st and 10th of May he defeated the Austrians under Kray at Engen and Biberach. In the next month he gained a decisive victory at Hochstadt, near Blenheim. After an armistice of a few months, the two armies met on December 3, 1800, at Hohenlinden, where Moreau won a very important victory, which induced the Austrians to sue for peace. The war being thus ended, he went to Paris, and became the chief of a party composed of royalists and republicans united by their enmity to Napoleon.

In 1804 he was arrested as an accomplice in Pichegru's conspiracy, and, although they failed to prove that he had any active part in it, he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment, which was commuted to exile in the United States. He resided with his wife at Morrisville, Pennsylvania, and in the city of New York, until overtures from the Czar of Russia induced him to return to Europe in July, 1813. He was caressed by the allied sovereigns and received with triumphal demonstrations by the people of Germany. The Czar said to Moreau, (who, it appears, was still a republican,) "I know your opinions; I will do nothing which can thwart them, and will leave France perfectly free." With these views, he co-operated with the allies against the French, and was mortally wounded at Dresden, August 27, 1813. He announced the fact by letter to his wife in these terms: "At the battle of Dresden, three days ago, I had both legs carried off by a cannon-ball. That rascal Bonaparte is always fortunate. Excuse my scrawl," etc.

Mornay, de, dẹh mor'nȧ', (PHILIPPE,) Seigneur du Plessis-Marly, often called DU PLESSIS-MORNAY, a noble French Protestant, eminent for virtue and talents, was born at Buhy, in Vexin, in 1549. He studied law, theology, and other sciences in Paris, Germany, and Italy. In 1572 he narrowly escaped from the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew, and in 1575 took arms for the Huguenots, of whom he became one of the chiefs. He married in 1576. About this time he entered the service of Henry of Navarre, who employed him in important negotiations and reposed in him entire confidence. He took part in the battle of Ivry in 1590, and then became a member of Henry IV.'s council. Mornay retained the favour of Henry after the latter had abjured his religion. In 1598 he published a "Treatise on the Institution of the Eucharist," which provoked the Catholics to challenge him to a dispute. At a public conference before the king, in 1600, he was foiled by Duperron. It appears that one of his own party had as unwisely as dishonourably furnished him with forged quotations from the Fathers, which his antagonist easily exposed. He was for many years the virtual chief or oracle of the French Reformed Church, and was styled "the Pope of the Huguenots." He left many able religious works. Died in 1623.

Morris, (GOUVERNEUR,) an able American statesman, born at Morrisiana, in Westchester county, New York, in January, 1752, was a half-brother of Lewis Morris, noticed below. He studied law, and was chosen a member of the Provincial Congress of New York in 1775. He became a delegate to the Continental Congress in 1777, and acquired distinction as an eloquent public speaker. About 1780 he removed to Philadelphia. He was appointed assistant superintendent of finance by Robert Morris in 1781, and served in that capacity for three years or more. He was one of the Pennsylvania delegates to the National Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States in 1787. His services in that convention were highly estimated by James Madison. In December, 1788, he went on private business to Paris, where he passed several years and kept a diary which possesses much historical interest. He was appointed minister from the United States to France early in 1792, and was recalled in October, 1794. He acted with the Federalist party, and was a friend of General Washington, whom he is said to have resembled in personal appearance. In 1800 he was elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of New York. His term in the Senate expired in March, 1803, after which he returned to private life. He married Anne C. Randolph, of Virginia, in 1809. He was one of the originators or promoters of the Erie Canal. Among his writings are a "Eulogy on General Hamilton," and a "Discourse on the Liberation of Europe from Military Despotism," (1814.) Died at Morrisiana in November, 1816. "Morris was endued by nature," says James Renwick, "with all the attributes necessary to the accomplished orator,—a fine and commanding person, a most graceful demeanour, which was rather heightened than impaired by the loss of one of his legs, and a voice of much compass, strength, and richness." ("Life of Clinton.")

Morris, (LEWIS,) an American patriot and signer of the Declaration of Independence, born in Westchester county, New York, in 1726, was a grandson of Lewis Morris, (the first of the name,) and half-brother of Gouverneur Morris, noticed above. He was elected to the Congress of 1775, and resumed his seat the following year. Died in 1798.

Morris, (LEWIS,) a British poet, a great-grandson of Lewis Morris (1702–65) the poet, already noticed. He was born at Carmarthen, Wales, about 1835, graduated at Jesus College, Oxford, in 1855, with honours, was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1861, and practised law until 1880. His principal works are "Songs of Two Worlds," (3 vols., 1871–75,) "The Epic of Hades," (1876–77,) "Gwin, a Drama," (1878,) "The Ode of Life," (1880,) etc.

Morris, (PHILIP RICHARD,) an English painter, born at Devonport, December 4, 1838. He was a pupil of Holman Hunt, and studied at the Royal Academy, of which he was made an associate in 1877. Among the best-known of his pictures are "The Shadow of the Cross," "Prison Fare," and "A Procession at Dieppe." His best works depict scenes of humble life, and are marked by tenderness and poetic treatment.

Morris, (RICHARD,) LL.D., an English philologist, born in Southwark, September 8, 1833. He was educated at Saint John's College, Battersea, and took orders in the English Church. His principal distinction was won as the editor of old English texts. He also published "Etymology of Local Names," (1857,) and various books for schools.

Morris, (ROBERT,) a distinguished statesman and financier, born in Lancashire, England, in 1734. At an early age he removed to America and entered into mercantile business in Philadelphia. He was a delegate to Congress in 1775, and the following year signed the Declaration of Independence. He was appointed superintendent of finance in 1781, being the first who had filled that office in the United States, and by his judicious and energetic measures rendered the most important services to the cause of the patriots. "The Americans," says a distinguished historian, "owe as much acknowledgment to the financial operations of Robert Morris as to the negotiations of Benjamin Franklin, or even the arms of George Washington." He pledged his private fortune to obtain supplies for the army, and originated the Bank of North America in 1781. He resigned his office in 1784, was a member of the Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States in 1787, and was elected a Senator of the United States in 1788. He was imprisoned for debt in his old age. Died in Philadelphia in 1806.

See the "National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans," vol. iv.

Morris, (THOMAS,) an American lawyer and statesman, born in Virginia in 1776. Having removed to Ohio, he was elected in 1830 a judge of the supreme court, and in 1832 a United States Senator. In this post he distinguished himself by his opposition to slavery, and in 1843 he was nominated for Vice-President by the Liberty party. Died in December, 1844.

Morris, (THOMAS A.,) D.D., an American Methodist divine, born in Kanawha county, Virginia, in 1794, was for a time editor of the "Western Christian Advocate," and in 1836 became Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Died September 2, 1874.

Mor'rĭ-sŏn, (JOHN ROBERT,) son of Rev. Robert Morrison, noticed below, born at Macao in 1814. He succeeded his father as secretary and interpreter to the British Factory at Canton, and was the author of a work entitled "The Chinese Commercial Guide," (1834.)

Morrison, (Rev. ROBERT,) D.D., an eminent English Orientalist and missionary, born in Northumberland in 1782. Having previously studied the Chinese language, he was sent by the London Missionary Society in 1807 to China, where he became translator to the East India Company's Factory at Canton. His translation of the New Testament came out in 1814, and was followed in 1815 by his "Chinese Grammar." In conjunction with Rev. Mr. Milne, he next translated the Old Testament into Chinese. It was completed in 1818, (in 21 vols. 12mo.) His great "Chinese Dictionary," printed at the expense of the East India Company, appeared in 1821. He visited England in 1824, and, having remained there two years, returned to his missionary labours in China, where he had founded in 1818 an Anglo-Chinese College. Among Dr. Morrison's other works we may name "Horæ Sinicæ," (1812,) a "View of China for Philological Purposes," etc., (1817,) and "Chinese Miscellany," (1825.) He was the first Protestant missionary to China, and as a Chinese scholar he occupies the highest rank. Died in 1834.

See "Memoirs of Robert Morrison," by his widow, 1839; A. RÉMUSAT, in the "Journal des Savants," 1824.

Mor'rōw, (JEREMIAH,) born in Pennsylvania in 1770, became United States Senator from Ohio in 1813, and was elected Governor of that State in 1822. Died in 1852.

Mors, [Fr. LA MORT, là mor,] the Latin name of the personification of Death, [Gr. Θάνατος,] said to be the offspring of Night. According to Homer, Death was the brother of Sleep.

Morse, (EDWARD SYLVESTER,) an American naturalist, born at Portland, Maine, June 18, 1838. He studied at the Scientific School of Harvard University, and became professor of zoology and comparative anatomy in Bowdoin College. He has published many papers on the molluscoids, worms, lower arthropods, and other groups of the animal kingdom.

Morse, (JEDEDIAH,) D.D., an American geographer and divine, born at Woodstock, Connecticut, in 1761. He graduated at Yale College, and in 1789 became pastor of the First Congregational Church at Charlestown, Massachusetts. He is principally known by his geographical works, which were the first of the kind published in America, and which also obtained a European reputation. He likewise published several historical works, and a number of sermons. Died in 1826.

Morse, (JOHN TORREY,) JR., an American lawyer and author, born in Boston, January 9, 1840. He graduated at Harvard College in 1860. His principal works are "A Treatise on Banks," "Law of Arbitration and Awards," "Famous Trials," "Life of Alexander Hamilton," "Life of John Quincy Adams," and "Life of Thomas Jefferson." He edited the "American Statesmen" series of biographies.

Morse, (SAMUEL FINLEY BREESE,) an American inventor and artist, born at Charlestown, Mass., April 27, 1791, was a son of Rev. Jedediah Morse. He graduated at Yale College in 1810, and went to England, where he studied painting under Benjamin West. He returned home in 1815, and painted portraits at various places. He visited Europe in 1829, and returned in 1832. During the passage homeward he suggested the idea of an electric telegraph, in conversation with his fellow-passengers. He constructed the apparatus of a recording electric telegraph, by which he conveyed despatches through a small distance, in 1835. About the end of 1837 he applied to Congress for aid, without success. He went to England in 1838 to obtain a patent, which was refused. Wheatstone, an Englishman, had invented a different apparatus, for the same purpose, about 1837. In the spring of 1843, Congress voted thirty thousand dollars to enable him to construct a line between Washington and Baltimore. His invention was brought into successful operation on that route in 1844, since which it has been rapidly introduced into nearly all countries of the civilized world. This result has been called the greatest triumph which human genius has obtained over space and time. Mr. Morse received gold medals and insignia of honour from several European sovereigns. The representatives of the principal European powers, assembled in Paris about 1857, presented to him the sum of 400,000 francs as a recompense for his invention. Morse's system is generally preferred to that invented in England, on account of its greater simplicity. Died April 2, 1872.

See DUNLAP, "History of the Arts of Design in America," vol ii. chap. xxiii.; "North American Review" for January, 1828.

Morse, (SIDNEY EDWARDS,) brother of the preceding, was born at Charlestown, Massachusetts, in 1794. He graduated at Yale College in 1811, and about 1815 became editor of the "Boston Recorder," a religious journal. In 1823 he founded, conjointly with his brother, R. C. Morse, the "New York Observer." He was the author of several popular school geographies, and invented a new method of engraving maps, called cerography. Died in 1871.

Mortemart, de, dĕh mort'mȧr', (CASIMIR LOUIS VICTURNIEN de Rochechouart—dĕh rosh'shoo-ȧr',) DUC, a French general and diplomatist, born in Paris in 1787. During the revolution of July, 1830, Charles X. requested him to form a new cabinet, of which he was nominated president; but it was too late. He was afterwards, in 1831, ambassador to St. Petersburg, and was made a senator in 1852. Died January 1, 1875.

Mortier, mor'te-ā', (ÉDOUARD ADOLPHE CASIMIR JOSEPH,) afterwards Duke of Treviso, a celebrated marshal of France, born at Cateau-Cambrésis in 1768. He served with great distinction in the principal campaigns from 1792 to 1799, when he was made general of division. In 1803 he was sent by Napoleon to Hanover, of which he soon took possession. He was created a marshal in 1804, and the year following received the grand cordon of the legion of honour. Being appointed in 1805 to command a corps of the grand army in Germany, he was attacked in November by the Russian general Kootoosof with 30,000 men, against whom he made a most gallant defence with greatly inferior numbers until reinforcements came up. For the signal bravery he displayed at the battle of Friedland, June, 1807, he was made Duke of Treviso. In the Spanish campaign of 1808 he assisted at the siege of Saragossa, and defeated the Spaniards at Ocaña and Gebora. He accompanied Bonaparte to Russia in 1812, and was commissioned by him to blow up the Kremlin. In 1814, in conjunction with Marshal Marmont, he exerted himself to the utmost to defend Paris from the allies, but, not succeeding in this, gave in his adhesion to Louis XVIII. After the revolution of 1830 he entered the service of Louis Philippe, and in 1835, while accompanying that monarch to a review, was one of the victims of Fieschi's "infernal machine."

Mor'tĭ-mẹr, (EDMUND,) Earl of March, an English nobleman, who married Philippa, only child of Lionel, Duke of Clarence. They had a son Roger, and were ancestors of Edward IV. Died in 1381.

Mortimer, (EDMUND,) fifth Earl of March, born about 1390, was the son of Roger, and grandson of the preceding. He was the lawful heir to the crown after the death of Richard II. Died in 1424.

Mortimer, (JOHN HAMILTON,) an English painter of history, born at Eastbourne, Sussex, in 1739. Among his works are "Saint Paul preaching to the Britons," and "King John signing Magna Charta." He was an inferior colorist, but his design was admired by his contemporaries. Died in 1779.

Mortimer, (ROGER,) Earl of March, the paramour of Isabella, Queen of England, born about 1287. Having been twice convicted of treason and pardoned by Edward II., he conspired with the queen against the life of the king, who was barbarously murdered. The guilty pair reigned for several years in the name of the young prince Edward III.; but Mortimer was at length made prisoner by order of the prince, and executed in 1330.

See HUME, "History of England;" FROISSART, "Chronicles."

Mortimer, (ROGER,) fourth Earl of March, was a son of the third earl. He died in 1398, leaving a son Edmund and a daughter Anne, who was married to Richard, Earl of Cambridge, and was a grandmother of Edward IV.

Mortimer, (THOMAS,) an English littérateur, born in London in 1730. He published "The British Plutarch," (6 vols., 1762,) "Elements of Commerce," etc., (1772,) "Compendium of History, Chronology, and Biography," (1777,) and other valuable works.

Morto da Feltre. See FELTRE, DA.

Mor'tọn, (CHARLES,) a learned English Puritan minister, born about 1626. He was ejected for nonconformity in 1662, after which he taught school in London about twenty years. He emigrated to New England in 1686, and became minister at Charlestown, Massachusetts. He wrote several religious works. Died in 1698.

Morton, (CHARLES,) an English physician and antiquary, born in Westmoreland in 1716. Elected a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1752, he became one of its secretaries in 1760, and in 1776 succeeded Dr. Maty as librarian of the British Museum. He was also a member of the Imperial Academy of Saint Petersburg. He made several valuable contributions to the "Transactions" of the Royal Society. Died in 1799.

Mor'tọn, (HENRY,) an American physicist, born in New York city, December 11, 1836. He graduated in 1857 at the University of Pennsylvania, where he became professor of chemistry in 1869. In 1870 he was chosen president of the Stevens Institute of Technology, at Hoboken. He has published many papers on chemistry and physics, and won a high reputation as an original investigator and as a teacher.

Mor'tọn, (JAMES DOUGLAS,) EARL OF, Regent of Scotland, born in 1530, was a nephew of the Earl of Angus. He married Elizabeth, a daughter of James Douglas, third Earl of Morton, and inherited the earldom in 1553, at the death of the third earl, who left no male issue. He joined the Protestant party, and became one of the lords of the congregation about 1558. In 1563 he was appointed lord high chancellor of Scotland. He lost that office by his complicity in the assassination of Rizzio. He was invited by Bothwell to join him in the plot for the murder of Darnley. He declined to act in that affair, but failed to inform against Bothwell. For this course he afterwards offered the excuse that the queen was already aware of the plot, so that it would be useless to reveal the secret to her. He fought against Bothwell and the queen at Carbery Hill. In 1567 he was restored to the office of lord chancellor by Regent Murray. He was appointed regent of the kingdom in 1572, and rendered himself odious by his rapacity and oppressive acts, but was supported by Queen Elizabeth. Having been accused as an accessory to the murder of Darnley, he was convicted and beheaded in June, 1581.

See ROBERTSON, "History of Scotland;" BURTON, "History of Scotland."

Morton, (JAMES DOUGLAS,) EARL OF, a Scottish astronomer, born in Edinburgh in 1707, was a Fellow of the Royal Society of London, and an associate of the Academy of Sciences, Paris. Died in 1768.

Mor'tọn, (JAMES SAINT CLAIR,) an American general, born in Philadelphia in 1829, was a son of Dr. Samuel George Morton, noticed below. He was educated at West Point, where he graduated as second of his class in 1851, after which he was employed as engineer at various places. He was appointed chief engineer of the army of the Ohio in May, 1862, and commanded the Pioneer Brigade at the battle of Stone River, January 1–2, 1863. For his services in this action he obtained the rank of brigadier-general. He was killed in an assault on Petersburg in June, 1864.

Morton, (JOHN,) an English prelate and statesman, born in Dorsetshire in 1410. He held several high offices under Henry VI., and, soon after the accession of Edward IV., was appointed Bishop of Ely, and lord chancellor of England. He was imprisoned by Richard III., but, having effected his escape, repaired to the continent, where he is said to have formed the plan, in conjunction with Henry, Earl of Richmond, of uniting the parties of York and Lancaster by the marriage of Henry to the daughter of Edward IV. Under Henry VII., Morton was created Archbishop of Canterbury, (1486,) and a cardinal, (1493.) He was the patron of Sir Thomas More, who eulogized him in his "Utopia." Died in 1500.

Morton, (LEVI PARSONS,) an American merchant and banker, the son of a Congregational clergyman, was born at Shoreham, Vermont, May 16, 1824. In 1849 he engaged in mercantile business in Boston, but subsequently removed to New York, where, in 1863, he established the banking-house of L. P. Morton & Co. He was twice elected to Congress, (1878 and 1880,) and in 1881 was appointed by President Garfield minister to France. In 1888 he became the successful candidate for Vice-President on the Republican ticket with Harrison.

Morton, (MARCUS,) an American jurist and Governor, born at Freetown, Massachusetts, in 1784. He was a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts from 1825 to 1840, and was elected Governor of that State by the Democrats in 1840 and 1843. Died in 1864.

Morton, (NATHANIEL,) one of the early settlers of Plymouth, born in England in 1612, was the author of "New England's Memorial," and a "History of the Church at Plymouth." Died in 1685.

Morton, (OLIVER P.,) an American Senator, born in Wayne county, Indiana, in 1823. He studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1847. He was Governor of Indiana from 1861 to 1865, and was elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of that State in January, 1867, for a term ending in March, 1873. During the civil war he was conspicuous for his zeal in the cause of his country. He died November 1, 1877.

Morton, (RICHARD,) an English physician, born in Suffolk about 1635, had a high reputation for skill and learning, and became in 1670 physician to the Prince of Orange. He was the author of "Exercises on Phthisis," and other medical works, in Latin.

Morton, (SAMUEL GEORGE,) an eminent American naturalist, ethnologist, and physician, was born in Philadelphia, January 26, 1799. His father, George Morton, who was descended from a large and highly respectable family in Clonmel, Ireland, emigrated to America and engaged in mercantile pursuits. The subject of our sketch early evinced a passionate fondness for books and thirst for knowledge, and combined with these a habit of persevering and methodical industry. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in March, 1820, and in October of the same year entered as a matriculate the University of Edinburgh, the diploma of which institution was conferred upon him in August, 1823. He returned to America in 1824, commenced the practice of medicine in 1826, and in 1827 married Rebecca G., daughter of Robert and Elizabeth Pearsall, highly respected members of the Society of Friends. His first scientific essay, entitled "Observations on Cornine, a New Alkaloid," was published in the "Medical and Physical Journal" for 1825–26. In 1827 he communicated to the Academy of Natural Sciences an "Analysis of Tabular Spar from Bucks County, Pennsylvania, with a Notice of Various Minerals found in the same Locality." During the same year he contributed to the "Journal of the Academy of Natural Sciences," Philadelphia, a "Description of a New Species of Ostrea Convexa of Say." These papers were followed in rapid succession by many other scientific communications, and the Journal of the Academy continued to be enriched by his labours until within a short period of his death. There were not less than forty of these contributions, besides others published in the "Transactions of the American Philosophical Society," and the "American Journal of Science and Arts," edited by Professor Silliman. These articles, by their varied range, exhibited great versatility of talent, treating as they did upon subjects connected with anatomy, ethnology, archæology, geology, palæontology, zoology, and mineralogy. His celebrated monograph on the "Cretaceous Group of the United States" was received, at the time of its publication, with great favour by the most eminent geologists of Europe. In 1834 he contributed to medical literature an important work on the "Anatomical Character, Causes, Symptoms, and Treatment of Pulmonary Consumption." He early began to make his now celebrated collection of crania, and up to 1840 had, with great labour and cost, succeeded in collecting no less than 1468 crania. In 1839 he gave to the world his "Crania Americana," and in 1844 his "Crania Egyptiaca," both of which were very favourably received. He was for some years president of the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences. He died in May, 1851. His name is often associated with Nott and Gliddon's "Types of Mankind," (1854,) based to some extent on Dr. Morton's researches; but that work, published after his death, and edited by those who very imperfectly understood his views, gives no just idea of the modest, impartial, and thoroughly scientific spirit with which he conducted all his inquiries. In the annals of science his name will always be associated with that of Blumenbach, the founder of human craniography. To this study he gave a powerful impetus, by demonstrating the precise method in accordance with which it should be pursued, and by indicating its capability of throwing light upon the origin and affiliations of the various races of men. Dr. Morton left several sons, of whom the eldest, an officer of great merit, died fighting bravely for his country, (see MORTON, JAMES SAINT CLAIR;) another son, THOMAS GEORGE, has become justly distinguished as one of the most skilful surgeons in the United States.

Morton, (THOMAS,) an English dramatist, born in Durham in 1764, was the author of numerous comedies and farces, which had great popularity in his time. His dramas entitled "Town and Country" and "A Roland for an Oliver" still retain their place on the stage. Died in 1838.

See BAKER, "Biographia Dramatica."

Morton, (THOMAS,) an English prelate, born at York in 1564, became successively Bishop of Chester, of Lichfield, and of Durham. He published several controversial treatises against papists and nonconformists. He was an intimate friend of Casaubon, to whose memory he erected a monument in Westminster Abbey. Died in 1659.

See BARWICK, "Life of Thomas, Bishop of Durham," 1660; BADDILY and NAYLOR, "Life of Thomas Morton," 1669.

Morton, (THOMAS GEORGE,) M.D., a distinguished American surgeon, a son of S. G. Morton, already noticed, was born in Philadelphia, August 8, 1835. He was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, graduating as M.D. in 1856. He became a surgeon of his native city, and acquired a great reputation as a brilliant and skilful operator. He has published many reports and professional papers, and is the inventor of important surgical appliances.

Morton, (WILLIAM THOMAS GREEN,) M.D., an American dentist and physician, born at Charlton, Massachusetts, in 1819. He settled in Boston, as a dentist, about 1842, and made some improvements in the fabrication of artificial teeth. He afterwards studied medicine and chemistry, to which he was attracted by a desire to discover a substance that would render his patients insensible to painful operations on their teeth. He began to use sulphuric ether as an anæsthetic in 1846. His claim to this invention was disputed by Dr. Jackson. Died in July, 1868. (See WELLS, HORACE.)

Mortonval, mor'tôn'văl', the assumed name of Furcy Guesdon, (fŭr'se' gā'dôn',) a French novelist, born in Paris about 1780. He wrote, besides other novels, "The Count of Villamayor," (1825.) Died in 1856.

Mo′ses, [Heb. מֹשֶׁה; Gr. Μωσῆς; Lat. MO′SES; Fr. MOYSE or MOÏSE, mo′ẽz′; It. MOISÈ, mo-e-sȧ′; Arabic, MOOSA, moo′sȧ,] an eminent Hebrew legislator and prophet, born in Egypt about 1570 B.C., was a son of Amram, of the tribe of Levi. In consequence of a royal edict that all male infants of the Hebrews should be killed, he was deposited by his mother in an ark or basket on the border of the Nile, and found by Pharaoh's daughter, who adopted him as her son. He became "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and mighty in words and deeds," and about the age of forty began to meditate the liberation of the oppressed Hebrews. Having incurred the anger of the king by his active sympathy with his own race, he fled to Midian, where he served as a shepherd about forty years. He received a divine mission to bring the children of Israel out of Egypt to the land of Canaan. Under his guidance the chosen people passed through the Red Sea into the Wilderness. He was instrumental in composing for them a code of laws called by his name, and is the reputed author of the book of Genesis and other books of the Pentateuch. The form of government which he prescribed to the Hebrews was a theocracy. The fundamental principles of the Mosaic law were that man must worship the only true God exclusively, and love his neighbour as himself. Having appointed Joshua as his successor, and obtained a distant view of the promised land, Moses died on Mount Pisgah, aged about one hundred and twenty years. He was pre-eminent for meekness.

Motin, mo'tȧN', (PIERRE,) a French poet, born at Bourges, lived about 1570–1600. He wrote a number of short poems, which are commended for grace and delicacy of sentiment.

Mot'ley, (JOHN LOTHROP,) an eminent American historian, born at Dorchester, Massachusetts, on the 15th of April, 1814. He graduated at Harvard in 1831, studied about a year in the University of Göttingen, and passed several years in visits to various countries of Europe. Having returned home, he studied law, which, however, he never practised to much extent. He published in 1839 a novel entitled "Morton's Hope, or the Memoirs of a Young Provincial." In 1840 he was appointed secretary of legation at Saint Petersburg, where he remained but a short time. He contributed articles to the "North American Review" and other periodicals, and produced in 1849 "Merry Mount, a Romance," which had little success. Having resolved to write a work on the history of Holland, he went to Europe in 1851 to collect materials and to make researches on that subject. He passed several years at Dresden, Berlin, and the Hague, and published "The Rise of the Dutch Republic: a History," (London, 3 vols. 8vo, 1856,) a work of great merit and profound research, which ran through several editions and was translated into French, Dutch, and German. Commenting on Prescott's "Philip II." and Motley's "Rise of the Dutch Republic," the "Edinburgh Review" of January, 1857, says, "They do honour to American literature, and they would do honour to any literature in the world." His next work—a continuation of the first—is entitled "The History of the United Netherlands from the Death of William the Silent to the Synod of Dort," (4 vols., 1860–67.)

"Mr. Motley's History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic," says a critic in the "Quarterly Review" for January, 1861, "is already known and valued for the grasp of mind which it displays, for the earnest and manly spirit in which he has communicated the results of deep research and careful reflection. Again he appears before us, rich with the spoils of time, to tell the story of the United Netherlands from the death of William the Silent to the end of the eventful year of the Spanish Armada; and we still find him in every way worthy of this 'great argument.' . . . Many of Mr. Motley's characteristics as a historian will appear from the extracts which we have made. It will be seen how vividly he can depict the places, the men, the deeds, of other days. But the work itself must be read to appreciate the vast and conscientious industry which he has so lavishly bestowed upon it. . . . At the same time, he is not oppressed by his materials, but has sagacity to estimate their real value; and he has combined and arranged with scholarly power the facts which they contain."

In 1861 he was appointed minister-plenipotentiary to Austria, but resigned this position early in 1867, in consequence of an offensive letter addressed to him by Mr. Seward, secretary of state. In the spring of 1869 he was sent as ambassador to England by President Grant, but, his friends becoming involved in a quarrel with the administration, Mr. Motley, in July, 1870, was requested to resign. Refusing to comply with the request, he was formally recalled in the following November. He subsequently resided in England, and published the "Life of John of Barneveldt," (2 vols., 1874.) Died May 29, 1877.

Mott, originally Coffin, (LUCRETIA,) an American reformer and philanthropist, born on the island of Nantucket in 1793. About 1808 her parents, who were members of the Society of Friends, or Quakers, removed to Philadelphia. In 1811 she was married to James Mott, of New York, who soon afterwards came to Philadelphia and entered into mercantile business with her father. While still very young, her attention had been called to the iniquity of slavery, and she felt it her duty to abstain from the products of slave labour. She travelled extensively as a minister, preaching the peculiar doctrines of the society in which she had been educated, inculcating obedience to the Divine light within the heart, and exposing the sinfulness of slavery and war. At the time of the separation in the Society of Friends, in 1827, she joined those popularly known as "Hicksites," (see HICKS, ELIAS,) and distinguished herself by the advocacy of Unitarian views of the most radical kind. She took an active part (1833) in the organization of the Anti-Slavery Society in Philadelphia, and in 1840 went as a delegate to the World's Anti-Slavery Convention, held in London; but, though otherwise treated with the greatest respect and courtesy, she was not admitted as a delegate, a majority of the convention having decided that women should be excluded from any active participation in the business of the assembly.

Mrs. Mott was long known as an earnest and eloquent advocate of anti-slavery principles, of the rights of women, and of other reformatory movements. As a speaker she was characterized by an unaffected simplicity and earnestness of manner, as well as by clearness and propriety of expression. Her high moral qualities, her uncommon intelligence, the beauty and consistency of her general character,—illustrated in her domestic as well as in her public life,—were such as to command the respect even of those who in opinion differed most widely from her in regard to religious and social questions. She died November 11, 1880.

Mott, (VALENTINE,) a famous American surgeon, born at Glen Cove, Long Island, New York, in August, 1785, was a son of Dr. Mott, of New York City. He graduated as M.D. at Columbia College in 1806, and afterwards pursued his studies in London and Edinburgh. He became professor of surgery in Columbia College, New York, about 1809. In 1826 he united with Dr. Hosack and others in founding Rutgers Medical College. He acquired a wide celebrity by his skill as an operator and by the original operations which he performed. It is said that he was the first that exsected the entire right clavicle, and that he tied the common carotid artery forty-six times. Sir Astley Cooper expressed the opinion that Dr. Mott "had performed more of the great operations than any man living." He was for many years professor of surgery and relative anatomy in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York. Among his writings are "Travels in Europe and the East," (1842,) and "Mott's Cliniques," (1860.) Died in 1865.

Motte, de la, dẹh lȧ mot, (ANTOINE Houdart—hoo'dȧR',) a French critic and dramatist, born in Paris in 1672. He was the author of the dramas of "Semele," "The Triumph of the Arts," and "Inez de Castro," (1723.) The last-named was very successful. He translated Homer's "Iliad," which he abridged for the sake of improving it, and thus, in the words of Voltaire, "changed a form glowing with youth and health into a fleshless skeleton." Among his other works we may name his "Reflections on Criticism," (1715,) in which he maintains the superiority of the moderns over the ancients. It caused a great sensation, and excited against him no little hostility among the literati. His prose writings are esteemed models of elegant composition. La Motte had been chosen in 1710 a member of the French Academy, having Rousseau as his competitor. Died in 1731.

Mozart, mo'zart', [Ger. pron. mōt'sȧrt,] (JOHANN CHRYSOSTOM WOLFGANG AMADEUS,) a celebrated German composer, born at Saltzburg on the 27th of January, 1756. Both his parents were distinguished for personal beauty. He began to perform on the harpsichord when he was about four years old, and manifested an exquisite musical organization. His first teacher was his father, who devoted much time to his education. At the age of six years he composed short pieces of music, and was regarded as a prodigy of musical genius. He had a sister four years his senior, who in early childhood was an excellent musician. In 1762 Leopold Mozart took Wolfgang and his sister to Munich, where they performed before the court and excited great admiration. They also visited Vienna, and exhibited their skill before the emperor and his family, by whom they were encouraged and caressed. In 1763 young Mozart excited the astonishment of the Parisians by his performance on the organ and by his talent for improvisation. He visited with his parents the principal cities of Germany, and published two of his compositions in 1763. The Mozart family passed the year 1764 in London, where they gave public concerts. About 1766 they returned to Saltzburg, where Wolfgang continued his studies, taking for models the productions of Handel and Emanuel Bach. He composed in 1768 an opera called "La Finta semplice," which was not represented. Accompanied by his father, he made the tour of Italy in 1769 and 1770, and was received with enthusiasm. He produced at Milan the opera of "Mitridate," which was performed with success in 1770. During his visit to Rome the pope created him a knight (cavaliere) of the Golden Spur. His next works were two serenatas, called "Ascanio in Alba," and "The Dream of Scipio," ("Il Sogno di Scipione," 1772.) He composed in 1773 an opera entitled "Lucio Silla," which was very successful. He passed several years in travel, and solicited employment in various foreign countries without success.

In 1779 he obtained the places of organist and chapel-master to the Archbishop of Saltzburg. At the request of the Elector of Bavaria, he composed "Idomeneo," an opera, (1781,) which was superior to his former works and obtained immense applause. "This work," says Denne-Baron, "was nothing less than a complete transformation of the art." He quitted the service of the archbishop,—a coarse and sordid person, who required him to eat with his menial servants,—and in 1781 settled in Vienna. In 1782 he composed a German opera, "The Abduction from the Seraglio," ("Die Entführung aus dem Serail,") and married Constance Weber. He became a friend of Haydn, the great composer.

Mozart composed, with unremitting activity and in rapid succession, symphonies, sonatas, quartets, motets, waltzes, etc. About 1785 he produced "Davidde penitente," an oratorio, which abounds in beauties of the first order. His comic opera "The Marriage of Figaro" ("Le Nozze di Figaro," 1786) was performed with unbounded applause, and, in the opinion of some critics, formed an epoch in dramatic music. His master-piece is the opera "Don Giovanni," or "Don Juan," which was first performed at Prague in 1787. The King of Prussia offered him 3000 crowns a year to attract him to Berlin; but he declined to quit the service of the emperor Joseph, who paid him only 800 florins. He was often reduced to painful distress for want of money while he lived in Vienna. Among his later works is "The Magic Flute," an opera, (1791.) Mozart, as a performer on the piano, surpassed all the German musicians of his time. His constitution was naturally delicate, and his health rapidly declined in 1791, during which he was employed to compose a requiem by a mysterious stranger, or a person who wished his name to be a secret. This person was an agent of Count Walsegg. To his morbid and depressed imagination this seemed as a warning of his own impending death. With this presentiment, he composed his "Requiem," which is considered his most sublime work. He died in Vienna, December 5, 1791, leaving several children.

"Mozart occupies," says Denne-Baron, "a unique place in the history of music, by the universality of his genius. . . . He excelled in all departments, and the products of his radiant imagination improved the art in all its parts. . . . In dramatic music he was unrivalled. His enlightened mind and his exquisite sensibility enabled him to seize with equal tact and sagacity the nuances and the true conditions of the lyrical drama." ("Nouvelle Biographie Générale.")

Müller, (JOHANN,) a celebrated German physiologist and zoologist, born at Coblentz on the 14th of July, 1801. He entered the University of Bonn about 1819, studied medicine and other sciences, and graduated as M.D. in 1822. In 1826 he published a remarkable treatise "On the Comparative Physiology of the Sense of Sight." He became professor of physiology, etc. at the University of Bonn in 1830. His work on the secreting glands, "De Glandularum secernentium Structura penitiori," etc., (1830,) is a valuable contribution to comparative anatomy. He succeeded Rudolphi as professor of anatomy in Berlin in 1833, and acquired a wide reputation as a lecturer. He made several anatomical discoveries. His principal work is a "Manual of Human Physiology," ("Handbuch (or Lehrbuch) der Physiologie des Menschen," 2 vols., 1841-44,) which is considered one of the best works ever written on that subject. There are few points of physiology on which he has not thrown light by numerous observations or new ideas. Among his numerous works are a Latin treatise "On the Respiration of the Fœtus," (1823,) and "Grundriss der Vorlesungen über allgemeine Pathologie," (1829.) Many of his works are illustrated by figures designed by himself. He edited a journal called "Archives of Anatomy and Physiology," (1834-40.) In the opinion of some critics, Müller was the first physiologist of Europe. He died in Berlin in April, 1858.

Müller, (KARL FRIEDRICH,) a German musician, born in 1797, the eldest of four brothers, celebrated quartet players, who made extensive tours under the name of "The Müller Brothers," and the father of four sons, who formed a famous quartet, known as "The younger Müller Brothers." The brothers of Karl were THEODOR HEINRICH GUSTAV, born 1799, died 1855; AUGUST THEODOR, born 1802, died 1875; FRANZ FERDINAND GEORG, born 1808, died 1855. His sons are BERNHARD, born in 1825; KARL, born in 1829; HUGO, born in 1832; and WILHELM, born in 1834. The younger quartet was broken up in 1873 by the appointment of Wilhelm as Kammermusikus and teacher at the Hochschule für Musik in Berlin.

Müller, (KARL Otfried—ot'freet,) a distinguished German scholar, historian, and antiquary, was born at Brieg, in Silesia, in 1797. He studied at Breslau, and subsequently devoted himself to philology at Berlin under the celebrated Böckh. He became in 1817 professor of ancient languages in the Magdalenum at Breslau, and in 1819 obtained the chair of archæology and Grecian art at Göttingen. In this post his able and eloquent lectures, and the numerous admirable works he published during the fifteen years following, gave a new impulse to the study of philology and antiquities in Germany. In 1839 Müller visited Italy, and the next year arrived at Athens. Having greatly fatigued himself while making excavations at Delphi, he was soon after attacked by a fever, of which he died in 1840. He was buried near the ruins of the Academy, and the University of Athens erected a monument over his grave. Among his principal works are his "History of the Hellenic Races and Cities," (1820,) "The Dorians," ("Die Dorier," 2 vols., 1824–30,) "Introduction to a Scientific System of Mythology," (1825,) "On the Origin and Ancient History of the Macedonians," (1825,) "The Etruscans," (2 vols., 1828,) "Manual of the Archæology of Art," (1830,) and "History of the Literature of Ancient Greece," (1840.)

He served for a time in the Seven Years' war, and became in 1786 professor of mathematics in the Academy of Engineers at Potsdam. He wrote several valuable treatises on military tactics. Died in 1804.

Müller, mŭl'lẹr, (OTHO FREDERIK,) an eminent Danish naturalist, born at Copenhagen in 1730. Being appointed in 1753 tutor to a young nobleman, he availed himself, while travelling with him, of the facilities for increasing his knowledge of botany and zoology. In 1764 he published his "Fauna Insectorum Friedrichsdaliana," and in 1767 his "Flora Friedrichsdaliana," giving an account of the insects and plants of Friedrichsdal. The great merit of these productions caused him to be appointed by King Frederick V. to continue the publication of the "Flora Danica," a magnificent work, surpassing anything of the kind that had hitherto appeared. Müller added two volumes to the three already published by Oeder. In 1773–74 he brought out a treatise (in Latin) "On Earth Worms and Fresh-Water Worms." In the first part of this work he describes the infusoria, of which he discovered many new species; and he was the first naturalist who distributed animalcules into genera and species. In 1781 his treatise "On the Hydrachnæ" appeared, and in 1785 one "On the Monoculi," both written in Latin and illustrated with many plates. These two works, together with a treatise on the Infusoria, (in 4to, with fifty plates,) published in 1786, are esteemed his greatest productions. Müller had begun in 1779 a "Zoologia Danica," a superb work, of which he published two parts, each with forty coloured plates. Several additions were made to it after his death, which took place in 1784. Müller is characterized by Cuvier as one of the most laborious and accurate observers of the eighteenth century; and the same writer adds, "The Infusoria form, as it were, a new animal kingdom, which he revealed to the world."

He studied history at Göttingen under Schlözer, and in 1772 published his "Cimbric War," ("Bellum Cimbricum.") He became, soon after, professor of Greek in the College of Schaffhausen, from which he removed to Geneva in 1774. About this date he formed a friendship with Victor de Bonstetten. He published in 1780 the first volume of his "History of the Swiss," which raised him to the first rank of historians. The second edition of it was entitled "The History of the Swiss Confederation," ("Die Geschichte der Schweizerischen Eidgenossen," 1786.) He was appointed in 1786 aulic councillor to the Elector of Mentz and librarian of the University of Mentz. About 1790 he accepted from Leopold II. of Austria the position of aulic councillor; but, the publication of his Swiss history having been prohibited by the Austrian court, he entered the service of the King of Prussia, as privy councillor, in 1795. The fourth volume of his great work appeared in 1805. In November, 1806, he had a private interview with Napoleon, who had invited him for that purpose, and who, according to some authorities, effected some change in Müller's political convictions. Through the influence of Napoleon he was appointed a councillor of state and director of public instruction by the King of Westphalia in January, 1808. He died at Cassel in May, 1809. Among his works are his correspondence with Bonstetten, entitled "Letters of a Young Savant to his Friend," (1801,) and "Twenty-Four Books of Universal History," (3 vols., 1811.)

Murat, mü'rȧ', (JEAN,) a French painter, born at Felletin in 1807. He gained the grand prize in 1837 for a picture of "Noah Offering Sacrifice." Died at Paris, September 25, 1863.

Murat, [sometimes Anglicized in pronunciation as mu-rȧt',] (JOACHIM,) a celebrated marshal of the French empire, and King of Naples, was born near Cahors, in the south of France, in 1771. His father was an innkeeper. Soon after the Revolution began, young Murat entered the guard of Louis XVI., from which he passed into a regiment of chasseurs. As he was a warm partisan of the popular cause, he was rapidly promoted, and in the campaign of 1796 was a favourite aide-de-camp of Bonaparte, whose fortunes he thenceforth followed and shared. Having signalized his impetuous bravery in the campaigns of Italy and Egypt, he was made a general of division in 1799. Soon after Bonaparte obtained the chief power, he gave to Murat his sister Caroline in marriage. Murat commanded the cavalry at Marengo in 1800, and was appointed governor of Paris in 1804, with the rank of general-in-chief. He received a marshal's bâton in 1804, and in 1806 was created Grand Duke of Berg and Cleves. At Austerlitz, Jena, and Eylau he directed the cavalry with brilliant effect. He was pronounced by Napoleon "the best cavalry officer in Europe," and was admired for his handsome figure, gorgeous costume, and chivalrous demeanour.

Murat commanded the army which invaded Spain in 1808, and in the same year was placed on the throne of Naples, where he was received with general joy, and reigned liberally and peacefully until 1812. He shared the reverses of the Russian campaign, (1812,) and in 1813 again fought for Napoleon, whose cause he deserted after the battle of Leipsic. He made a treaty with the court of Vienna in January, 1814, and engaged to support the allies with his army; but he failed to aid them efficiently, and was accused of duplicity. As the Congress of Vienna appeared indisposed to recognize his claim, he secretly renewed his relations with the exiled emperor, whose cause he openly espoused in March, 1815. Calling the Italians to rise for liberty, he commenced hostilities against the Austrians in Northern Italy, but was repulsed and finally defeated at Macerata in May, and then fled to France. In October, 1815, he landed with about thirty men in his former kingdom, and made a desperate attempt to recover it, but was soon captured and shot. As a ruler, he appears to have been mild and humane, but he was deficient in political ability as well as moral courage. His wife survived him many years, and took the title of Countess of Lipano. (See BONAPARTE, CAROLINE.) Murat left two sons, Napoléon Achille and Lucien Charles Joseph.

Murat, (NAPOLÉON ACHILLE,) a son of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1801. He emigrated to Florida about 1822. He wrote a "Moral and Political View of the United States," (1832,) and several other short works. Died in Jefferson county, Florida, in 1847.

Murat, (NAPOLÉON LUCIEN CHARLES,) PRINCE, a French senator, born at Milan in 1803, was a son of Joachim Murat. He married Miss Fraser, an American, about 1827. After a long exile, he was permitted to enter France in 1848. He supported the policy of Napoleon III., who appointed him a senator in 1852. Died 1878.

Muratori, moo-rȧ-to'ree, (LUDOVICO ANTONIO,) an eminent Italian scholar, historian, and antiquary, born near Módena in 1672. He became librarian and archivist to the Duke of Módena in 1700, and continued in this office till his death. He published in 1751 his great work entitled "Writers of Italian History," ("Rerum Italicorum Scriptores," 27 vols. fol., 1723–38,) which was followed by his "Italian Antiquities of the Middle Ages," (6 vols., 1738,) "New Treasury of Ancient Inscriptions," (6 vols., 1739,) and "Annals of Italy," (in Italian, 12 vols., 1744.) He died in 1750, with the reputation of one of the most learned men of his time.

Mur'ċhĭ-sọn, (CHARLES,) a British physician, born in Jamaica in 1830. He graduated at the University of Edinburgh, and practised medicine with great success in London. He published a "Treatise on Continued Fevers," and "Lectures on Diseases of the Liver." Died April 23, 1879.

Mur'ċhĭ-sọn, (Sir RODERICK IMPEY,) an eminent British geologist, born at Taradale, Ross-shire, Scotland, on the 19th of February, 1792, was a son of Kenneth Murchison. He was educated at the Military College of Marlow, entered the army in 1807, and served in several battles in the Peninsula. He was also on the staff of his uncle, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, in Sicily. He married a daughter of General Hugonin in 1815, and quitted the army about 1816. By the advice of Sir Humphry Davy, he applied himself to the study of natural science, and attended lectures at the Royal Institution. About 1825 he produced a "Geological Sketch of the Northwestern Extremity of Sussex." He became a member of the Geological Society in 1825, and of the Royal Society in 1826. In company with Sir Charles Lyell, he explored in 1828 the geology of Auvergne, Provence, and Piedmont, on which they wrote jointly three memoirs. In 1830 he began to examine the older sedimentary strata of England and Wales, to which he gave the name of Silurian system. He published the results of these researches in an important work entitled "The Silurian System." He was the first who discovered the relations of these palæozoic strata and classified them according to the succession of organic remains. In 1845 Mr. Murchison and M. de Verneuil published "The Geology of Russia and the Ural Mountains," (2 vols. 4to.) The former received the honour of knighthood in 1846. He was elected president of the Royal Geographical Society in 1844 and 1852, and received the Copley medal in 1849, for the establishment of the Silurian system. Among his numerous works is "Siluria: the History of the oldest known Rocks containing Organic Remains, with a Brief Sketch of the Distribution of Gold over the Earth," (1854.) He had been chosen president of the Geological Society several times between 1830 and 1842.

In 1855 he was appointed Director-General of the Geological Survey of the United Kingdom. He was elected president of the Royal Geographical Society in 1864, and received the Copley medal in 1866. Died in 1871.

Murdoch, mur'dŏk, (JAMES EDWARD,) an American actor and elocutionist, born in Philadelphia, January 25, 1811. His first public performance was in Philadelphia in 1829. In 1833 he appeared successfully in the character of "Romeo," with Miss Fanny Kemble as "Juliet," and from that time became a leading actor in tragedy and comedy. About five years later he retired from the stage, and opened a school in Boston for mental and physical training. He afterwards returned to the stage, and in 1853 he visited California. In 1855 he went to Europe, and while in London performed at the Haymarket Theatre with great applause. He returned to the United States in 1857. Mr. Murdoch's style is strictly original, his articulation distinct, and his versatility and range of character remarkable. At the commencement of the war of the rebellion he devoted his time and attention to his country, giving readings and recitations in the camps, caring for the sick and wounded, and rousing the people to the aid of the suffering. He served for some time on the staff of General Rousseau. Since the close of the war he has devoted himself to his profession.

Mur'doch, or Mur'dock, (WILLIAM,) a Scottish inventor, born near Auchinleck, August 25, 1754. In 1792 he lighted his own house with coal-gas, in 1784 he made a small locomotive steam-engine, and the first oscillating engine was devised by him. Died in 1839.

Mur'dŏck, (JAMES,) D.D., a learned American Congregational divine, born at Westbrook, Connecticut, in 1776. He graduated at Yale College, and was appointed professor of ancient languages at the University of Vermont in 1815, and in 1819 of sacred rhetoric and ecclesiastical history in the theological seminary of Andover. He translated from the German Mosheim's "Institutes of Ecclesiastical History," and Münscher's "Elements of Dogmatic History," (1830,) and published several original works. Died in 1856.

Mure, mūr, (WILLIAM,) a Scottish critic and scholar of great eminence, born at Caldwell in 1799. Murillo, mu-ril'lo, [Sp. pron. moo-rēl'yo,] (BARTOLOMÉ ESTEBAN,) the most celebrated painter of the Spanish school, was born at Seville in 1618, and was a pupil of his uncle, Juan del Castillo. About the age of twenty-four he went to Madrid, where he derived advantage from the friendly counsels of Velasquez and perfected himself in his art. Having returned to Seville in 1645, he soon acquired a high reputation in history, portraits, and other branches of painting. He was patronized by the King of Spain, and adorned the churches of Madrid, Seville, and Cadiz with his works. As a colorist he surpassed all other Spanish artists. His productions are remarkable for originality, fidelity to nature, freedom of touch, and softness, splendour, and harmony of colour. He delighted and excelled in the representation of virgin saints and of beggar-boys at play. Among his master-pieces are "Moses Striking the Rock," "The Marriage of Saint Catherine," "Saint Elizabeth of Hungary," "Christ Feeding the Five Thousand," a "Young Beggar," "The Prodigal Son," a "Holy Family," and "Saint Anthony of Padua." He died, in consequence of a fall from a scaffold, in 1682.

Murray, (Hugh,) a Scottish geographer and miscellaneous writer, born in East Lothian in 1779. Among his principal works are "Discoveries and Travels in America," (1829,) "Encyclopædia of Geography," (1834,) and "History of British India." Died in 1846.

See "Quarterly Review" for January, 1821.

Murray, (James,) a Scottish writer, born at Dunkeld in 1702, was the author of a work entitled "Aletheia; or, A System of Moral Truths." Died in 1758.

Murray or Moray, (James Stuart,) Earl of, often called Regent Murray, born about 1533, was a natural son of James V. of Scotland and Margaret Erskine. In 1558 he joined the "Lords of the Congregation," as the Protestant chiefs styled themselves, and in 1560 was sent to France to invite Queen Mary (his half-sister) to return to her kingdom. She returned in 1561, and he became her most favoured and powerful minister, and was made Earl of Murray. His talents, firmness, and courage had already caused the Reformers to regard him as the head of their party. The marriage of Mary with Darnley, (1565,) against the advice of Murray, caused a breach between him and the queen, which was afterwards greatly widened by the countenance she showed to Darnley's murderers. Mary having been deposed, he was appointed regent of the kingdom in August, 1567. In 1568 she escaped from Lochleven Castle, and raised an army, which was quickly routed by the regent at Langside. At the trial of Mary, which Queen Elizabeth instituted, the regent appeared as evidence against the captive queen. By this and other acts he had incurred the bitter hatred of the queen's party, and they resolved upon his destruction. In January, 1570, he was waylaid, shot, and mortally wounded by James Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh, a notorious desperado, who was afterwards selected by the agents of Philip II. to assassinate the Prince of Orange.

The character of the regent Murray has been estimated very differently, according to the temper or prejudice of those who have judged him. By his firmness, moderation, humanity, and impartial justice, he appears to have well deserved the title of "the Good Regent," by which he was known among the people of Scotland. "Those," observes Froude, "who can see only in the Protestant religion an uprising of Antichrist, and in the Queen of Scots the beautiful victim of sectarian iniquity, have exhausted upon Murray the resources of eloquent vituperation, and have described him as a perfidious brother, building up his own fortunes on the wrongs of his injured sovereign. . . . But facts prevail at last, however passionate the predilection; and, when the verdict of plain human sense can get itself pronounced, the 'good regent' will take his place among the best and greatest men who have ever lived."

Murray, (John,) a Scottish physician, published a

"System of Materia Medica and Pharmacy," and "Elements of Chemistry." Died in 1820.

Murray, (JOHN,) a celebrated divine and preacher, born in Hampshire, England, in 1741, is regarded as the founder of Universalism in America. Having emigrated to the United States in 1770, he was appointed in 1775 a chaplain in the army. He took part in the proceedings of the Universalist Convention in 1785, and subsequently became pastor of a church in Boston. Died in 1815.

See "Records of the Life of John Murray," written by himself.

Murray, (JOHN,) an eminent English publisher, born in London in 1778. He commenced in 1803 a career of publication which is perhaps unrivalled in the annals of literature. About 1807 he projected the "Quarterly Review," in which he obtained the co-operation of Canning and Scott, and published the first number in 1809. His sagacity in discerning the merits or talents of authors, and his tact in anticipating the wants of the public, rendered him very successful. He was a liberal patron of literature, and a generous friend to Byron and other eminent authors. Died in 1843.

See "Gentleman's Magazine" for August, 1843; "Autobiography of William Jerdan," vol. iii. chap. ii.

Murray, (LINDLEY,) a distinguished American grammarian and educational writer, born near Lancaster, Pennsylvania, in 1745, was a member of the Society of Friends. Having removed at an early age to New York, he studied law, but he subsequently engaged in mercantile pursuits. The latter part of his life was spent in England, to which he removed about 1784. Among his works, which obtained great popularity both in England and America, we may name his "Power of Religion on the Mind," etc., (1787,) "Grammar of the English Language," (1795,) "English Reader," "Introduction to the English Reader," and "Duty and Benefit of a Daily Perusal of the Holy Scriptures," (1817.) He also compiled several French readers. He died near York, England, in 1826.

Murray, (Sir ROBERT.) See MORAY.

Murray, (WILLIAM,) Earl of Mansfield, lord chief justice, a British lawyer and orator of great merit and celebrity, was born at Perth, Scotland, in 1704. He was a younger son of Andrew, Viscount Stormont. Having gained distinction as a classical scholar at Oxford, and enlarged his mind by foreign travel, he was called to the bar in 1731. He speedily rose into extensive practice, and in 1743 was appointed solicitor-general. About this time he entered the House of Commons, where he was successful as an elegant and persuasive speaker, and defended the government when Mr. Pitt (Lord Chatham) was the leader of the opposition. "He surpassed Pitt," says Macaulay, "in correctness of taste, in power of reasoning, in depth and variety of knowledge; but he wanted the energy, the courage, the all-grasping and all-risking ambition which make men great in stirring times." ("Review of the Life of the Earl of Chatham.") He was appointed attorney-general in 1754, and chief justice of the king's bench in 1756. Over that great court he presided with honour above thirty years. In 1756 he was raised to the peerage, as Baron Mansfield. On more than one occasion he refused high political positions, among which was that of lord chancellor. He had, however, a seat in the cabinet for more than a year. In the trial of Woodfall for publishing "Junius's Letters," Lord Mansfield gave offence to the popular party, and was censured for leaning against the freedom of discussion in cases of libel. During the riots of 1780, his house in London was burned down by a mob. He died, without issue, in 1793. "His mind and his habits," says Lord Brougham, "were eminently judicial; and it may be doubted if, taking both the externals and the more essential qualities into the account, that go to form a great judge, any one has ever administered the laws in this country whom we can fairly name as his equal."

Musæ, mū'zē, [Gr. Μοῦσαι,] the Muses, sometimes called PIER'IDES, in the Greek mythology, the daughters of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, (Memory,) were supposed to preside over poetry, the liberal arts, and the sciences. According to the generally received opinion, there were nine Muses, namely, Calliope, Clio, Euterpe, Erato, Melpomene, Polyhymnia, Terpsichore, Thalia, and Urania. (See these names under their separate heads.) The places especially consecrated to the Muses were Mount Parnassus, Mount Helicon, and the fountains of Castalia and Aganippe.

Musaeus. See MUSÄUS.

Musæus, mu-zee'us, [Gr. Μουσαῖος; Fr. MUSÉE, mü'zȧ',] a celebrated and ancient Greek bard, commonly regarded as a semi-fabulous personage. He was said to be the son of Eumolpus and Selene, or, according to others, of Orpheus, of whom he was a disciple. Tradition informs us that he presided over the Eleusinian mysteries in the time of Hercules. He was the reputed author of several poetical works, among which were "Oracles," and a hymn to Ceres. Pausanias regarded this hymn as the only genuine poem of Musæus that was extant in his time. Onomacritus collected the Oracles of Musæus and mixed with them some of his own productions, which he wished to pass for the work of Musæus. For this imposture he was banished by Hipparchus, the son of Pisistratus.

See VIRGIL, "Æneid," book vi. 666; ULRICI, "Geschichte der Hellenischen Dichtkunst."

Musæus, surnamed GRAMMAT'ICUS, or "the Grammarian," is supposed to have lived in the fifth century. He is celebrated for his poem of "Hero and Leander," a production of rare merit, of which several good editions have been published.

See KROMAYER, "De Musæo Grammatico."

Musset, de, dĕh mü'sā', (LOUIS CHARLES ALFRED,) a celebrated French poet, born in Paris on the 11th of November, 1810, was a son of Musset-Pathay, noticed below. He was educated at the Collége Henri IV. In 1830 he produced a volume entitled "Tales of Spain and Italy," ("Contes d'Espagne et d'Italie,") which attracted much attention. His reputation was increased in 1833 by "The Cup and the Lips," ("La Coupe et les Lèvres,") a drama, "A quoi rêvent les jeunes Filles?" and "Namouna." He fell into a morbid state of mind, and expressed misanthropic sentiments in several of his works, which are censured for an immoral tendency. He published "Rolla," a poem, in 1835, and "Confessions of a Child of the Age," (Enfant du Siècle,) in 1836. He contributed to the "Revue des Deux Mondes" a number of prose tales, which were admired. Under the reign of Louis Philippe he was librarian to the ministry of the interior. He was admitted into the French Academy in 1852. Among his finest works are four poems entitled the "Nights," etc., ("Nuits: La Nuit de Mai, La Nuit d'Août, La Nuit d'Octobre, et La Nuit de Décembre," 1835–37.) Died in Paris in May, 1857.

"None of his illustrious contemporaries," says Leo Joubert, "has surpassed him in spontaneity of poetical genius, in the ardent and sincere expression of passion, in vivacity, grace, and éclat of soul, (esprit;) no one has represented with more fidelity the spiritual unrest, the mélange of skepticism and religious aspirations, which characterize our epoch." Nâdir Shâh, nâ'dir shâh, written also Nader Chah, Nadir Schah, and Nauder Shah, also called Koolee (or Kouli) Khân, koo'lee kân, a celebrated Persian conqueror, of Turkish extraction, born in Khorassân in 1688. His courage and abilities early gained him distinction in the service of the governor of that province; but, in consequence of ill treatment, he left Khorassân and became the head of a band of robbers. Being soon after called upon by Tahmasp, Shah of Persia, to oppose the Afghans, he succeeded, within two years, in expelling them from the country, upon which he was made commander-in-chief, (1729.) Tahmasp having in 1732 made a disadvantageous treaty with Turkey, Nâdir resolved to prosecute the war, and gained such popularity by the success of his arms that on his return he dethroned the Shah and assumed the supreme power. In 1738 he conquered Candahar and Afghanistan. Having soon after invaded India, he entered Delhi in 1739, and took possession of the imperial treasures. The inhabitants, on a false report of Nâdir's death, attacked his soldiers. After an ineffectual attempt to restrain them, he ordered a wholesale massacre, in which, it is stated by Fraser, 120,000 perished. His many acts of tyranny and cruelty at length caused him to be assassinated, (1747.) In the early part of his career Nâdir Shah appears to have been not only an able, but, on the whole, a just and humane, prince; but later in life, having become a prey to avarice and suspicion, his acts, it is said, "exceeded in barbarity all that has been recorded of the most bloody tyrants."

Nannoni, (LORENZO,) a surgeon, born at Florence in 1749, was a son of the preceding. He wrote on anatomy and surgery. Died in 1812.

Nansouty, de, dẹh nôN'soo'te', (ÉTIENNE ANTOINE MARIE Champion—shôN'pe-ôN',) COUNT, a French general, born at Bordeaux in 1768. He was made a general of brigade about 1798, and a general of division in 1803. According to Châteaubriand, he was one of the best cavalry officers that the war of the Revolution produced. The same writer states that he completed the victory at Austerlitz, (1805,) and commenced that of Wagram, (1809.) He was wounded at Borodino, (1812,) and commanded the cavalry at Leipsic. In 1814 he entered the service of the restored Bourbons. Died in February, 1815.

Nanteuil, nôN'tuĬ' or nôN'tuh'ye, (CÉLESTIN,) a French painter and lithographer, born in Rome in 1813. He became a resident of Paris.

Nanteuil, (CHARLES FRANÇOIS Lebœuf—lẹh'bŭf',) a French sculptor, born in Paris in 1792. He gained the grand prize in 1817. Among his works is "Eurydice Dying." Died November 2, 1865.

Nanteuil, (ROBERT,) a French artist, born at Rheims in 1630, painted excellent portraits in pastel, but was chiefly distinguished as an engraver. Among his master-pieces are the portraits of the secretary of state, Simon Arnaud de Pomponne, and Van Steenbergen, the Dutch advocate. In the department of portrait-engraving Nanteuil has never been surpassed. He was designer and cabinet engraver to Louis XIV. Died in 1678.

Nā'pĭ-er, (Sir CHARLES JAMES,) a British general, born at Whitehall in 1782, was the son of the Hon. George Napier and Lady Sarah Lennox, a daughter of the Duke of Richmond. He was a cousin of Admiral Charles John Napier, and a brother of Sir William, the historian. He gained the rank of major in 1806, was wounded in several actions in Spain between 1808 and 1812, became lieutenant-colonel in 1811, and was employed in ravaging the coasts of the United States in 1813–14. He acted with credit for several years as Governor of Cephalonia, from which he was recalled in 1830. Having risen to the rank of major-general, he was appointed commander of the army in Bengal in 1841. He increased his reputation by the conquest of Sinde, (1843,) in which he performed several exploits that were highly extolled. His efforts to reform the civil administration of Sinde are also commended. He returned to England in 1847, and was again sent to India in 1849, to oppose the Sikhs, but on his arrival found that the war was ended. In 1850 he returned home. He was the author of "Lights and Shadows of Military Life," and other works. Died in 1853.

See Sir W. F. P. Napier, "Life and Opinions of Sir Charles J. Napier;" "Blackwood's Magazine" for July and August, 1857.

Nā'pĭ-er, (Sir Charles John,) K.C.B., an eminent British admiral, born in Stirling county, Scotland, in 1786, was the son of the Hon. C. Napier, of Merchiston Hall, Scotland, and a descendant of the inventor of logarithms. He entered the navy in 1799, and, after fighting in several actions with the French, distinguished himself at Baltimore and other places in the United States in 1813 and 1814. After 1814 he passed about fifteen years in inaction, on half-pay. He commanded the Portuguese fleet which in 1833 gained a decisive victory over the fleet of Don Miguel, for which he was made a Portuguese grandee of the first class. As second in command, Captain Napier served with distinction at the reduction of Acre, in 1840, and was rewarded with the title of knight commander of the Bath. In 1841 he became rear-admiral, and commanded the Channel fleet for several years. He advocated naval reform in letters which were printed, and as a member of Parliament supported liberal, or rather radical, measures. After the commencement of the Russian war, he was appointed commander of the Baltic fleet, (1854,) and proposed to take Cronstadt, but found it too well fortified, and returned without any remarkable achievement. After his return to Parliament, in 1855, he imputed his failure to the fault of the ministers. He attained the rank of admiral in 1858. Died in November, 1860. "In his name is summed up all that he was. A Napier is a man possessed of high spirits, immense courage, great ingenuity, and prodigious egotism." ("London Times," November, 1860.)

See General E. Napier, "Life and Correspondence of Admiral Sir Charles J. Napier," 1861.

Napier, (Francis,) Lord, a British diplomatist, a son of the eighth Baron Napier, was born in 1819. He became minister-plenipotentiary to the United States about 1856. In December, 1860, he was appointed ambassador-extraordinary to the court of Russia, and in 1864 was transferred to Berlin. In 1866 he became Governor of Madras.

Napier, (Henry Edward,) an English naval officer and writer, born in 1789, was a brother of Sir Charles James Napier. He published "Florentine History from the Earliest Authentic Records," (6 vols., 1847.) Died in 1853.

Napier, written also Naper, Neper, or Nepair, [Lat. Napie'rus,] (John,) Baron of Merchiston, a Scottish mathematician, celebrated as the inventor of logarithms, was born at Merchiston Castle, near Edinburgh, in 1550. He was the son of Sir Archibald Napier, master of the mint. He entered the University of Saint Andrew's about 1563, and a few years later travelled in France, Germany, and Italy. He appears to have returned about 1571, after which he devoted himself to mathematics, theology, and literature. In 1593 he published an ingenious work called "A Plain Discovery of the Revelation of Saint John," in which he labours to prove that popery is antichristian. It is probable that prior to 1594 he began the train of inquiry which resulted in the discovery of logarithms. His tables were first published in 1614, with the title of "The Description of the Wonderful Law of Logarithms." ("Mirifici Logarithmorum Canonis Descriptio.") "The invention of logarithms," says Hallam, "is one of the rarest instances of sagacity in the history of mankind; and it has been justly noticed as remarkable that it issued complete from the mind of its author, and has not received any improvement since his time." In solving the problems of trigonometry, this invention is of immense utility, as it reduces the labour of months to a few days, and liberates the operator from the errors which are almost inevitable in long calculations. He died in 1617, leaving several sons, the eldest of whom, named Archibald, was raised to the peerage in 1627, with the title of Lord Napier.

Nā'pĭ-er, (Joseph,) an Irish lawyer and politician, born at Belfast in 1804. He was called to the bar in 1831, and elected to Parliament for the University of Dublin in 1848. He became attorney-general for Ireland in 1852, and was lord chancellor of Ireland from March, 1858, to June, 1859. Died December 9, 1882.

Napier, (Macvey,) a Scottish editor, born in the county of Stirling in 1776. He became professor of conveyancing in the University of Edinburgh. He edited the seventh edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and succeeded Lord Jeffrey as editor of the "Edinburgh Review" in 1829. He performed the duties of this position with ability for about eighteen years. Among his contributions to the "Edinburgh Review" is an article on "Raleigh," (April, 1840.) Died in 1847.

Napier, (Mark,) a Scottish antiquary, born in 1798. He wrote "Memorials and Letters of the Time of John Grahame of Claverhouse," a "Life of Napier of Merchistoun," (1834,) a "Life of Montrose," (1840,) and other works. Died at Edinburgh, November 23, 1879.

Napier, (Robert,) a Scottish mechanical engineer, distinguished for the construction of steamships, was born at Dumbarton in 1791. He served an apprenticeship to a blacksmith, and in 1815 became master of a smithery in Glasgow. A few years later he began to make engines for steamboats, and afterwards became the head of the large establishment of Robert Napier & Sons, of Glasgow. He constructed the machinery of the British Queen, and about 1840 furnished Mr. Cunard with four steamships which plied between England and the United States. In 1856 he built the Persia, which was perhaps unrivalled in strength and speed, and subsequently built several iron-clad ships for the navy. Died June 23, 1876.

Napier, (Sir Robert,) a British general, born in Ceylon about 1810. He served as an officer of the army in India, and became chief engineer of Bengal. During the Sepoy mutiny of 1857–58 he rendered important services as military engineer. He commanded an expedition sent against Abyssinia about the close of 1867. He gained a decisive victory at Magdala in April, 1868, over King Theodore, (who was killed,) and was rewarded with the title of Lord Napier. Died January 14, 1890.

Napier, (Sir William Francis,) a British general, famous as the historian of the Peninsular war, was born at Castletown, Kildare county, Ireland, in 1785. He was a brother of General Charles James Napier, and cousin of Admiral Charles J. Napier. He entered the army in 1800, and obtained the rank of captain in 1804. From 1808 to 1814 he served in the Peninsular war, during which he was frequently wounded. He received medals for his conduct at Salamanca, (1812,) and at the battles of the Nivelle and Orthes, etc., and became lieutenant-colonel in 1813. In 1828 he produced the first volume of his "History of the War in the Peninsula from 1807 to 1814," (6 vols.,) which was finished in 1840, and found its way to the summit of public favour, although its tenor was not in accordance with the popular and political prejudices of the times. He disapproved the policy of the English government, and estimated with candour the acts of Napoleon and his army. The work is admired for dignity of tone, fidelity to truth, and beauty of style. He was made major-general in 1841, and lieutenant-general in 1851. His wife was a daughter of General H. E. Fox, a relative of Lord Holland. Sir William published a "History of the Conquest of Scinde," and a few other works. Died in February, 1860.

Na-po′le-on [Fr. Napoléon, nâ′po′lâ′ôn′] III., (Charles Louis Napoléon Bonaparte,) Emperor of France, a son of Louis Bonaparte and Hortense de Beauharnais, was born at Paris, in the Tuileries, April 20, 1808. He was inscribed at the head of the register of the family of the Napoleonic dynasty, the emperor having recognized Louis and his heirs as successors to the crown in preference to his elder brothers. His mother, being compelled to quit France in 1815, took this son with her in her exile, and gave him for preceptors P. Lebas and Colonel Armandi. He passed several years of his youth at Arenenberg, in the Swiss canton of Thurgau. On the accession of Louis Philippe, in 1830, Louis Napoleon requested permission to return to France, which was not granted. He and his brother then went to Italy and enlisted in the army of insurgents, who at first gained some advantages over the papal troops, but were defeated and dispersed by the Austrians in 1831. On the death of the Duc de Reichstadt, in 1832, Louis Napoleon became a pretender to the throne of France. He published a work entitled "Political Reveries," and a "Manual of Artillery," (1836.) His ambition, his name, and his unscrupulous audacity urged him to enter a career which presents the most wonderful vicissitudes of fortune. Having secured the aid of Colonel Vaudrey and other officers stationed at Strasbourg, he made an attempt on that place, with a few adherents, in October, 1836. He failed, was arrested, and was banished or transported to the United States in November of that year.

In 1837 he returned to Europe, attended Queen Hortense in her last illness at Arenenberg, and took refuge in England, where he passed about two years. In 1839 he published his "Napoleonic Ideas," ("Idées Napoléoniennes,") which has been described as a "mélange of liberal principles and prætorian domination." It is an apology for the régime of Napoleon I. The unpopular measures of Louis Philippe encouraged Louis Napoleon to engage in another rash and desperate enterprise. Attended by about fifty partisans and a tame eagle, which was expected to perch upon his banner as the harbinger of victory, he sailed from England in August, 1840, and entered Boulogne, where he obtained but little support, and was speedily arrested by the soldiers who he had hoped would be induced to join his standard. He was tried on a charge of treason by the House of Peers, and, after he had made a speech in his own defence and professed his devotion to the principle of popular sovereignty, was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. He was confined in the Castle of Ham, where he pursued his political studies and wrote several political and historical treatises. Aided by his physician, Dr. Conneau, and disguised as a labourer, he escaped from Ham in May, 1846, and retired to England.

The revolution of 1848 afforded him an opportunity to return to France, and thus opened a new field to his irrepressible ambition. In June, 1848, he was elected to the National Assembly for the department of the Seine. He was excluded from that body by Lamartine and his colleagues for a time, but he took his seat in September, 1848, and became a candidate for the office of president of France. On the 10th of December, 1848, he was elected president for four years, having received 5,562,834 votes. His chief competitor was General Cavaignac, who obtained 1,469,166 votes. He soon became involved in a contest with the Constituent Assembly, the republican majority of which regarded him with hostility or suspicion. In April, 1849, he sent an army to Rome to intervene in favour of the pope, who had been expelled by the republicans. The French army took Rome, and continued to occupy that city until 1866.

The Constituent Assembly dissolved itself, and was succeeded by the Legislative Assembly in May, 1849. The president appointed the celebrated De Tocqueville minister of foreign affairs in June, 1849. This minister, perceiving that the president expected him and his colleagues to be the pliant instruments of his will, resigned in October of that year. De Tocqueville afterwards remarked, "We were not the men to serve him on those terms." Louis Napoleon encountered a strong opposition in the Legislative Assembly, which in May, 1850, restricted universal suffrage and ordered that a residence of three years in a commune must be a qualification of voters. A long and violent struggle between the president and the representatives of the people was terminated by the coup d'état of December 2, 1851. Having secured the support of the army, by a reckless violation of his plighted faith he raised himself to the supreme power. The Assembly was forcibly dissolved, and the leading statesmen were arrested. Legislators and felons, statesmen and vulgar culprits, were huddled together in the same vehicle and conveyed to prison. Before the end of the year his acts were ratified by the form of a popular election, and he was chosen president for a term of ten years. A new constitution was adopted in January, 1852, and the legislative functions were divided between two houses, the Senate and the Corps Législatif, which, however, were so organized that they offered little or no check to his absolute power. The question whether he should take the title of emperor was submitted to the vote of the people in November, 1852, when, according to the official report, 7,824,189 voted in the affirmative. He assumed the title of Napoleon III., and married a Spanish lady of great personal attractions, Eugénie Marie de Guzman, Countess de Teba, in January, 1853. Having formed an alliance with England and publicly announced that his policy was peace, he, in conjunction with his new ally declared war against Russia in March, 1854, and sent an army to the Crimea. After a long siege, the allies took Sevastopol in September, 1855, and the war was ended by the treaty of Paris in March, 1856. Among the events of this year was the birth of the prince imperial, Napoléon Eugène Louis, etc.

One great aim of Napoleon III. appears to have been to reconcile the French people to the loss of liberty by promoting their material prosperity, by splendid public improvements, and by gratifying their passion for military glory. Accordingly, as an ally of the King of Sardinia in the war caused by the aggressions of Austria, he led a large army into Italy in May, 1859. He commanded in person at the battle of Solferino, where the Austrians were defeated, June 24, 1859, and in the next month concluded the peace of Villafranca. (See Francis Joseph.) Among the results of this war was the cession of Nice and Savoy to France by the King of Sardinia, who had extended his own dominions by the conquest of Lombardy. In 1861 he availed himself of the opportunity presented by the breaking out of the civil war in America, to intervene in Mexico, and fitted out against that republic an expedition which landed a well-appointed army under General Forey early in 1862. After several victories over the Mexican Liberals, the French forces entered the city of Mexico in June, 1863. Napoleon offered the imperial crown of Mexico to Maximilian of Austria, who accepted the fatal gift and was supported by a part of the native population. The United States refused to acknowledge the Mexican emperor, and intimated to Napoleon that European powers would not be permitted to establish monarchies by arms in North America. He accordingly withdrew his army from Mexico about the end of 1866, so that the result of the Mexican enterprise was the reverse of glorious for France. It is well understood that he sympathized with the slaveholders in their war against the Union, at least so far as they sought the disruption of the confederation.

Before the commencement of the American war, Napoleon was justly regarded as the most adroit and most successful sovereign in Europe. But his prestige was greatly impaired by the events of 1866. He remained neutral in the war between Austria and Prussia, which war he probably might have prevented; but in the diplomatic contest which ensued between France and Prussia he appears to have found more than a match in the genius of Count Bismarck, who suddenly raised Prussia to the rank of a first-rate power and united the Germans in a determined attitude against the aggressiveness of France. The French felt themselves humiliated by the fact that so great changes in the map of Europe should have been effected without their agency or concurrence, and condemned the policy by which France was isolated and excluded from the hope of extension towards the Rhine. After the battle of Sadowa, July 3, 1866, Napoleon offered himself as a mediator between the belligerent powers. The Emperor of Austria ceded to him Venetia, instead of surrendering it to the King of Italy, to whom it seemed naturally to belong. About the 10th of December, 1866, the French army was withdrawn finally from Rome, and the pope, finding himself in a critical position, addressed to Napoleon language which was far from complimentary. Napoleon and Bismarck were involved in a dispute about Luxemburg, which the former purchased of the King of Holland; but the Prussians occupied a strong fortress in that province, which they refused to relinquish. It was generally believed that war was imminent; but the difficulty was settled by a European Convention which met in London in May, 1867, and decided that neither France nor Prussia should retain possession of Luxemburg.

The exciting and warmly-contested elections of May and June, 1869, showed so great an increase of votes against imperial despotism, that Napoleon thought it expedient to make large concessions to the people and the legislative body. He gave the latter the right to elect its own officers, to have partial control over the expenditure of the public money, the right of interpellation, and the privilege to share with himself the power of initiating laws. He proclaimed a general amnesty for political offences in August, 1869. In December of that year he appointed Émile Ollivier prime minister, and requested him to form a cabinet. "Designate persons," he said, "who will, associated with yourself, form a homogeneous cabinet faithfully representing the legislative majority." This was regarded as the end of personal government in France, and the beginning or restoration of a constitutional régime. He addressed to prime minister Ollivier, March 22, 1870, an important letter, in which he says, "I think it opportune, under present circumstances, to adopt all the reforms required by the constitutional government of the Empire, in order to put an end to the immoderate desire for change which prevails in certain minds." He afterwards issued an address and appeal to the people, asking their votes, in these terms: "Do the people approve the liberal reforms which have been effected in the Constitution since 1860 by the Emperor, with the concurrence of the great legislative bodies of the state, and ratify the senatus-consultum of April 20, 1870?" On the eve of the election the government detected or concocted an extensive plot to assassinate Napoleon, and arrested many suspected persons. The result of the plébiscite of the 8th of May was that about 7,000,000 voted yes, and 1,500,000 voted no. Louis Napoleon wrote a "History of Julius Cæsar," (1867,) in which he carries out the "Idées Napoléoniennes," inculcating the doctrine that certain gifted men are appointed by Providence or destiny to rule, and that it is as necessary for the people as for themselves that this destiny should be fulfilled.

Without a reasonable pretext or tangible cause, he declared war against Prussia about July 15, 1870, and, having appointed the Empress regent, took the command of his army in person. The Germans crossed the frontier early in August, and assumed the offensive. The French were outnumbered and outgeneralled in a series of great battles at Wörth, Metz, and near Sedan. On the 2d of September, Napoleon, who had displayed great incapacity as a general, surrendered himself, with about 100,000 men as prisoners of war, at Sedan. The déchéance of Napoleon was passed in the corps législatif, and a republic was formed by the citizens of Paris, September 4, 1870. He died at Chiselhurst, January 9, 1873.

Nârădă, nä'rạ-dạ, written also Nareda, the name of a celebrated Hindoo sage and lawgiver, supposed to have been the son of Brahma and Saraswatî. He was the inventor of the Vina, a sort of lute, and is said to have been an intimate friend of Krishna.

Năr'ă-sĭng'hă, [modern Hindoo pron. nŭr'ạ-sing'hạ or nŭr'ạ-sing', from the Sanscrit nără, a "man," and singhă, a "lion,"] (the "Man-Lion,") the name, in the Hindoo mythology, of the fourth Avatar of Vishnu. It is related that Hiranyakasipu,* by his penances and sacrifices in honour of Brahma, had obtained as a boon from that deity that he should possess universal monarchy and be wholly exempt from death or injury from every god, man, or creature in existence. Having now nothing to fear, his arrogance and impiety became insufferable. He had, however, a son of a wholly different character, and remarkable for his piety and virtue. The son, reproving his father's wickedness, once said to him that the Deity was present everywhere. "Is he in that pillar?" said the angry tyrant. "Yes," replied the son. Thereupon Hiranyakasipu, in contempt, struck the pillar with his sword, when the stony mass fell asunder, and a being, half man and half lion, issuing from its centre, tore to pieces the impious wretch who had thus insulted and defied the Divine Power.

See MOOR, "Hindu Pantheon."

Nârâyănă, nä-rä'yạ-nạ, a Sanscrit word of somewhat uncertain etymology, commonly supposed to signify "moving upon the waters," and applied, in the Hindoo mythology, to the universal Divine Spirit, which existed before all worlds. (Compare Genesis i. 2.) In this sense, Nârâyana may be regarded as another name for BRAHM, (which see;) but it is also frequently used as one of the many appellations of Vishnu.

Narbonne, de, dẹh năR'bon', (LOUIS,) COUNT, a French courtier and minister of state, was born of the noble family of Narbonne-Lara at Colorno, in Parma, in 1755. He was taken to Paris in 1760, and educated at court, where his mother was a lady of honour. He was handsome, accomplished, and witty, and a favourite of the royal family. In the Revolution he acted with the constitutional party, and became a confidential friend of Madame de Staël, who regarded him with admiration. "She exalted him in her imagination," says Lamartine, "until she raised him to the height of her ideal." By her influence, partly, he became minister of war in December, 1791. He tried with success the policy of frankness and confidence towards the Assembly, and extorted applause even from the stern and suspicious radicals. He performed prodigies of activity in raising armies and preparing for war. Inspired by his fervent, rapid, and martial eloquence, a glow of patriotism pervaded France. He was suddenly dismissed from office in March, 1792, in consequence of a difference with his colleague and rival De Lessart. About the 10th of August he was proscribed by the Assembly, but, by the efforts of Madame de Staël, escaped to England. He returned to France in 1800, and was restored to his rank as lieutenant-general in 1809. Soon after that he was made ambassador to Bavaria. He attended Bonaparte as aide-de-camp in the Russian campaign, (1812.) Died in 1813.

Narborough, nar'bŭr'ẹh, (Sir JOHN,) an English naval officer, distinguished himself in the war with the Dutch in 1666. In 1672 he served as second captain under the Duke of York against De Ruyter in the engagement of Solebay, where his bravery and skill were conspicuous. He was created rear-admiral and made a knight in 1673. In 1674 he was sent against the pirates of the Mediterranean, and forced the Bey of Tripoli to give up his British captives and pay a large sum of money for previous injuries to British trade. Died in 1688.

He was on the ship Resolute in the Arctic voyage of 1852–54, served in the Crimean war, was for many years employed in hydrographic surveys in various parts of the world, commanded the Challenger expedition, 1872–74, and led the expedition of 1875–76 in the Arctic waters west and northwest of Greenland with the ships Alert and Discovery, of which voyage he published a "Report" (1876) and a "Narrative," (1878.) He also published various works on maritime subjects.

Nares, (JAMES,) an English composer, born in Middlesex in 1715. His principal compositions are anthems and other church music; he also published "Lessons for the Harpsichord," and various treatises on music. In 1756 he succeeded Green as organist and composer to the king. He was the preceptor of the composer Arnold. Died in 1783.

Nares, (ROBERT,) a distinguished critic and theologian, a son of the preceding, was born in 1753. He became Archdeacon of Stafford, and pastor of Allhallows Church, London; he also held the office of assistant librarian of the British Museum. He published, among other works, "Elements of Orthoepy," (1784,) and a "Chronological View of the Prophecies relating to the Christian Church," (1805.) Naseef-al-Yazajee or Nasîf-al-Yazaji, nâ-seef' âl yâ'zą-jee, a distinguished Arabic scholar and writer, born in "the Lebanon," probably near the commencement of the present century. Although a Christian, he is said to have devoted his life solely to the study of the language, history, literature, and grammar of the Arabs. In his treatise on grammar he has condensed, with rare ability and skill, the whole system of the Arab grammarians. "No more complete exposition of the subject," says Mr. Chenery, "has ever been brought into a volume of the same size." He has also written "Makâmât," ("Assemblies,") in imitation of Hareeree, (Harîrî.) "Nasîf," says the same critic, "has little of the poetical power of his great original, but in curious learning he almost equals him."

Naselli, nâ-sĕl'lee, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian painter, born at Ferrara. The churches of Ferrara contain many of his works. Died about 1630.

Nash, (ABNER,) an American statesman and lawyer, born in Prince Edward county, Virginia. Having settled in North Carolina, he was elected in 1779 Governor of that State. Died in 1786.

Nash, (FREDERICK,) an American jurist, born at Newbern, North Carolina, in 1781, was a son of Abner Nash. He resided mostly at Hillsborough. He became a judge of the supreme court of North Carolina in 1844. Died in 1858.

Nash, (JOHN,) an English architect, born in London in 1752. He was appointed in 1815 inspector of the royal buildings. He furnished the designs for the Hay-Market Theatre, Buckingham Palace, and the Pavilion of Brighton, also the plans of Regent Street and Regent's Park. Died in 1835.

Nash, (JOSEPH,) an English painter and designer, born about 1812. He designed illustrations for "The Architecture of the Middle Ages," (1838.) He was distinguished as a painter of architecture. Died in 1878.

Nash, (RICHARD,) usually called BEAU NASH, was born at Swansea, Wales, in 1674. He entered the Middle Temple as a student of law, but had an invincible aversion to study and business. He distinguished himself as a man of fashion, a master of the science of gentility, and a paragon of effrontery. His skill as a gambler yielded him an ample revenue. In 1704 he found Bath a vulgar and mismanaged watering-place, infested with ill-bred people. He got himself appointed master of ceremonies, and, by enforcing the rules of good breeding at balls, public assemblies, etc., converted Bath into a fashionable and elegant place of resort. His person was coarse and ungainly, but his vivacity and benevolent or prodigal habits rendered him popular. He is said to have taken measures to guard the unwary youth from falling victims to the designs of villains. During a part of his long period of prosperity and supremacy at Bath, he rode in a six-horse coach with a retinue of servants. In his old age he was impoverished by the act of Parliament which suppressed gaming. Died in 1761.

See OLIVER GOLDSMITH, "Life of Richard Nash," 1763; "Eccentric Personages," by WM. RUSSELL, 1866.

Nash, (THOMAS,) an English wit and dramatist, born in Suffolk about 1564. He has published tables for laboratory use, and edited translations of various hand-books of Wöhler and Elderhorst.

Nassare, nâs-sâ'rà, (BLAS ANTONIO,) a Spanish writer on various subjects, born at Alguezar in 1689; died in 1751.

Nassau, nas'saw, [Ger. pron. nâs'sŏw,] HOUSE OF, a noble family, of German origin, which produced many great men, and derived its title from Nassau, on the Rhine. In the sixteenth century the family acquired the principality of Orange, in the southeast of France, after which the Counts of Nassau took the title of Prince of Orange. (See ORANGE, and WILLIAM III. of England.)

Nassau, (HENRY,) COUNT OF, a Flemish nobleman, inherited from his father large estates in Brabant, Flanders, and Holland. In 1515 he married the sister of Philibert, Prince of Orange, by whom he had a son René. Henry was a confidential friend of Charles V., whose governor he had been in that emperor's boyhood. "It was he," says Motley, "whose influence placed the imperial crown upon the head of Charles." He was the uncle of William of Orange, the founder of the Dutch republic.

Nassau, (MAURICE OF,) [Dutch, MAURITS VAN NASSAU, mŏw'rits văn nâs'sŏw; Ger. MORITZ VON NASSAU, mo'rits fon nâs'sŏw,] one of the greatest captains of modern times, was born at the castle of Dillenburg in November, 1567, and was the second son of William the Silent, Prince of Orange, who founded the Dutch republic. About the age of twenty he was elected Governor and Captain-General of the Seven United Provinces, which were then at war with Spain. In 1591 he took Deventer, Zutphen, and other fortified towns. He defeated the Spaniards in a great pitched battle at Turnhout in 1597, and gained a decisive victory over the Archduke Albert of Austria at Nieuwport in 1600. In the ensuing campaigns his skill as a tactician was exerted with uninterrupted success until 1609, when Spain recognized the independence of the Dutch, and a truce of twelve years was signed by the two powers. The patriot Barneveldt, by promoting this peace and opposing the ambitious projects of Maurice, incurred his enmity, and finally became a victim of his cruelty. (See BARNEVELDT.) Maurice received the title of Prince of Orange at the death of his elder brother, about 1618. In 1621 he renewed the war against the Spaniards, who opposed to him the celebrated general Spinola. "His great capacity in the military art," says Hume, "would have compensated the inferiority of his forces, had not the Spanish armies been commanded by Spinola." Maurice compelled his rival to raise the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom in 1622, but Spinola took Breda in 1625. He died in 1625, and was succeeded in the office of Stadtholder by his brother, Frederick Henry, who was the grandfather of William III. of England. Maurice made important improvements in the military art, and excelled especially in the reduction and defence of fortified places.

Neal, (JOHN,) an American poet and littérateur, born at Portland, Maine, in 1793. His first publications were a series of essays on the works of Byron, which appeared in "The Portico," a monthly magazine. These were soon followed by his novel entitled "Keep Cool," (1817,) "The Battle of Niagara," (1818,) "Goldau, the Maniac Harper," and other poems; also "Logan," (1822,) "Seventy-Six," (1823,) and other novels. In 1824 he visited England, where he contributed a number of able and interesting articles on American literature to "Blackwood's Magazine." After his return, he published the novels of "Rachel Dyer," (1828,) "The Down-Easters," (1833,) "True Womanhood," (1859,) and several other works. In 1870 appeared his "Wandering Recollections of a Somewhat Busy Life." "The elements of poetry," says R. W. Griswold, "are poured forth in his verses with a prodigality and power altogether astonishing; but he is deficient in the constructive faculty." Died at Portland, June 20, 1876.

Ne-an'dẹr, [Ger. pron. nȧ-ȧn'dẹr,] (JOHANN AUGUST WILHELM,) an eminent German theologian and ecclesiastical historian, of Jewish extraction, was born at Göttingen in 1789. He became in 1812 professor of theology at Berlin, where he devoted himself zealously to the duties of his office and the advancement of Christianity by his numerous writings. Of these the most important is his "Universal History of the Christian Religion and Church," (in 5 vols., 1843.) Among his other productions we may name "The Emperor Julian and his Times," (1812,) "Memorable Occurrences from the History of Christianity and Christian Life," (3 vols., 1822,) "History of the Planting of the Apostolic Church," (1832,) and "The Life of Jesus Christ in its Historical Relations," (1837,) an able refutation of the well-known work of Strauss. Neander was a member of the Consistory of the province of Brandenburg. His writings have obtained great reputation and influence in foreign countries, as well as in Germany. Died in Berlin in July, 1850.

"Neander still remains beyond doubt the greatest church historian, thus far, of the nineteenth century.

Great, too, especially in this, that he never suffered his renown to obscure at all his sense of the sinfulness and weakness of every human work in this world. With all his comprehensive knowledge, he justly regarded himself as, among many others, merely a forerunner of a new, creative epoch of ever-young Christianity. . . . 'We stand,' he said, 'on the line between the old world and a new, about to be called into being by the ever-fresh energy of the gospel. For a fourth time an epoch in the life of our race is in preparation by means of Christianity.'" (Dr. Schaff's "History of the Apostolic Church.")

Ne-ar'chus, [Gr. Νέαρχος; Fr. NÉARQUE, nā'ärk',] a celebrated admiral of Alexander the Great, was a native of Crete, or, as some assert, of Amphipolis. About 327 B.C. he set sail from the Indus for the Persian Gulf, and discovered on his passage the mouths of the Euphrates and the Tigris. A detailed account of this voyage is given by Arrian, the accuracy of which has been confirmed by Vincent and other modern geographers. Nearchus, on his return, was received with distinguished favour by Alexander, who assured him that he rejoiced more in the success of the expedition than in having conquered Asia. He also received from his sovereign a golden crown. After the death of Alexander, Nearchus was made governor of Pamphylia and Lycia.

Nebi, nēb'ee, an admired Turkish poet of the seventeenth century, flourished under the reign of Mahomet IV.

Ne'bo, called in Assyrian NABIU or NABU, "the prophet," a great divinity of ancient Babylon. He was possibly the same as the Persian Mithra. He was by the Accad people called "the Creator," and among the Assyrians was the god of knowledge and books. He was called "the overseer of the hosts of Heaven and Earth."

Neb-ris-sen'sis, (ANTONIUS,) an eminent Spanish scholar, whose proper name was ANTONIO DE LEBRIXA, (dȧ lȧ-BREE'HȦ,) was born at Lebrixa in 1444. He studied the classics in Italy, and, returning to Spain in 1473, became to that country what Erasmus was to Germany or Budé (Budæus) to France. As professor in the University of Salamanca, he initiated a reform in the method of teaching Latin and Greek. He published a Latin Lexicon, (1492,) a "Lexicon of Civil Law," (1506,) which is highly commended, and grammars of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages. About 1514 he became professor of rhetoric at Alcalá. "The men to whom Spain chiefly owes the advancement of useful learning," says Hallam, "were Arias Barbosa and the more renowned Antonio de Lebrixa." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") Died in 1522.

He took Jerusalem in 606 B.C., and carried to Babylon many captives, among whom was the prophet Daniel. King Zedekiah having revolted, Nebuchadnezzar took his capital in 588, destroyed the great temple by fire, threw down the walls of the city, and transported the Jewish people to Babylon. He afterwards captured Tyre, conquered Egypt, and became probably the most powerful monarch of that age in the world. Having become too much elated by pride and prosperity, he was, by divine visitation, deprived of his reason and deposed from his throne. Restored to reason and power a short time before his death, he published a pious proclamation of his experience and of his recognition of the King of heaven.

Necker, nek'kẹr or nȧ'kaiR', (ALBERTINE ADRIENNE de Saussure—dẹh sō'sür',) a Swiss authoress, born at Geneva in 1766, was a daughter of the naturalist, H. B. de Saussure. She was married to J. Necker, a nephew of the great financier, and a cousin of Madame de Staël, of whom she was an intimate friend. She wrote a "Notice of the Character of Madame de Staël," (1820,) and "Progressive Education," (2 vols., 1828–32.) Died in 1841.

See SENEBIER, "Histoire littéraire de Genève."

Necker, nek'kẹr, [Fr. pron. nȧ'kaiR',] (JACQUES,) an eminent Swiss financier, and prime minister of France, born at Geneva in September, 1732. On leaving college he became a clerk in a banking-house in Paris, and, having acquired a large fortune as partner of the great banker Thélusson, he retired from business in the prime of life, and aspired to public honours and more brilliant financial achievements. In 1773 he gained the prize offered by the French Academy for a eulogy on Colbert, and published a treatise on the corn-laws, "Sur la Législation des Grains." The disorder of the finances was so alarming that, without regard to official routine, he was appointed director of the treasury in 1776, and director-general of the finances in 1777. By publicity, order, and economy, he restored the public credit and lightened the burdens of the people. His famous compte rendu of 1781 (which was the first public exposition of the revenue and expenses of the State) was received with great favour; but his reforms made for him many enemies at court and elsewhere. To defend himself against their intrigues, he asked for a seat in the council, which was refused because he was a Protestant. He immediately resigned, (1781,) and retired to Coppet, on Lake Leman.

In 1784 he published his excellent work "On the Administration of the Finances," of which eighty thousand copies were sold in a few days. The convocation of the States-General was decreed by the royal council in August, 1788. The court was convinced that the skill of Necker was indispensable in the political and financial crisis that followed. He succeeded Brienne as prime minister, or contrôleur-général of finances, about September 1, 1788, and the next day the funds rose 30 per cent. He favoured the Revolution by granting to the Tiers-État a double number of deputies. He is censured for this concession, and for temporizing in the contest between the Tiers-État and the other orders after the meeting of the States-General in 1789. The court having adopted more violent measures than he approved, he tendered his resignation, (June 23,) which was not accepted. On the 11th of July he was suddenly dismissed by a note from the king, who ordered him to leave the kingdom privately; and the same night he departed for Brussels. Indignant at his dismissal, the populace of Paris rose in arms, stormed the Bastille, and obtained a bloody triumph over the court. Necker was recalled on the 21st of July, and, when he entered Paris, was received with enthusiastic demonstrations by the people. His first act was an amnesty for political offences. But he was too conservative to satisfy the popular party, and resigned his office in September, 1790. He passed the rest of his life at Coppet, where he wrote several political and religious treatises. Died in 1804. The highly-gifted Madame de Staël was his daughter.

Nel'sọn, (DAVID,) an American Presbyterian divine and eloquent preacher, born near Jonesborough, Tennessee, in 1793. He became pastor of a church at Danville, Kentucky, in 1828, and subsequently assisted in founding a college in Marion county, Missouri, of which he was appointed president. His work entitled "The Cause and Cure of Infidelity" enjoys a high reputation, and has passed through numerous editions. Dr. Nelson was an earnest advocate for the abolition of slavery. Died in 1844.

Nel'sọn, (HORATIO,) LORD, a British naval hero and admiral of the first order, born at Burnham Thorpe, in Norfolk, on the 29th of September, 1758, was the son of Rev. Edmund Nelson and Catherine Suckling. He was endowed with great intrepidity and energy, and possessed a generous, impetuous temper. He went to sea about the age of thirteen, served a number of years in the East Indies, and took part in several actions of the American war. In 1779 he became a post-captain, and in 1787 married the widow of Dr. Nisbet, of the island of Nevis. He obtained command of a ship in the Mediterranean fleet in 1793, contributed to the victory over the Spaniards at Saint Vincent in 1797, and was raised to the rank of rear-admiral in the same year. His next enterprise was an attack on Teneriffe, where he was repulsed, with the loss of his right arm.

In 1798 he attempted to intercept the passage of the French armament to Egypt, but missed it, until he overtook it in Aboukir Bay, where in August he gained the decisive battle of the Nile. For this service he was rewarded with the title of Baron Nelson of the Nile, and a pension of £3000. While he was employed on the coast of Naples, (1799,) he became fascinated by the pernicious influence of Lady Hamilton, and tarnished his fame by executing Prince Carraccioli and other republicans, who were sacrificed to the vengeance of the court of Naples. Soon after these events he separated from his wife, who was supplanted in his affections by Lady Hamilton. He was second in command under Sir Hyde Parker of the armament sent against Copenhagen in 1801; but the honour of the victory at the battle of the Baltic is ascribed to Nelson. In the midst of the battle, Parker having made a signal to retreat, Nelson put a spy-glass to his blind eye and exclaimed, "I really don't see the signal." "He had won the day," says Southey, "by disobeying orders." For this success he was raised to the rank of viscount.

War against France having been renewed in 1803, he took the command of the Mediterranean fleet, hoisted his flag on the Victory, and watched the French fleet off Toulon for more than a year. In May, 1805, he sailed for the West Indies in pursuit of Admiral Villeneuve, but was disappointed, and the hostile fleet returned safely to Europe, followed by the English admiral. He then went home and proposed to suspend his active service, but was re-appointed in September, 1805, in accordance with the general wishes of the nation, by whom he was more idolized than almost any other man had been. On the 21st of October, (1805,) with twenty-seven sail of the line and four frigates, he attacked the combined French and Spanish fleets, of forty ships, under Villeneuve, near Cape Trafalgar. Before the fight began, he gave the famous signal, "England expects every man to do his duty." The English gained a complete victory, but Nelson was mortally wounded by a musket-ball fired from the Redoutable, which was in close proximity to the flag-ship, the Victory. He is eulogized by Southey as "the greatest naval hero of our own and of all former times."

Nemours, de, (JACQUES DE SAVOY,) DUC, a distinguished French general, born in Champagne in 1531, was the son of Philip, Duc de Génevois and de Nemours, whose sister Louise was the mother of King Francis I. He fought against the Protestants in the civil war, and distinguished himself at the battle of Saint-Denis, in 1567. He opposed the ambitious designs of the Guise family, and took no part in the civil war between the League and the king. Died in 1585.

See BRANTÔME, "Vies des grands Capitaines."

Nemours, de, (LOUIS D'ARMAGNAC,) DUC, a French military commander, born about 1472, was a son of Jacques, noticed above. He served in Italy against the Spaniards, and was made Viceroy of Naples by Louis XII. He was killed in the battle of Cerignola, while opposing Gonsalvo de Córdova, (1503.) He was the last of the family of Armagnac, and the duchy of Nemours was given to Gaston de Foix in 1505.

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Français;" SAINT-GELAIS, "Histoire de Louis XII."

Nemours, de, (LOUIS CHARLES PHILIPPE RAPHAEL d'Orléans—dor'lā'ôn',) DUC, a French prince, a son of King Louis Philippe, was born in 1814. He was chosen King of Belgium by a congress of that nation in 1831, but was compelled by his father to decline the offer. He served in the army in Algeria, and obtained the rank of lieutenant-general in 1837. After the death of his elder brother (1842) he was recognized as future regent in case the king should die during the minority of his heir, the Count of Paris. On the abdication of Louis Philippe (1848) he waived his claim to the regency in favour of the Duchess of Orléans, whom he attended when she presented herself, with her son, before the Chamber of Deputies.

See A. PASCAL, "Le Duc de Nemours, son Passé et son Avenir politique," 1842.

Nemours, de, (MARIE D'ORLÉANS,) DUCHESSE, daughter of the Duke of Longueville, was born in 1625, and married in 1657 to Henry of Savoy, Duke of Nemours. She died in 1707, leaving interesting "Memoirs" of her life and times, which were published in 1709.

Ne'pos, (CORNELIUS,) a celebrated Roman historian of the time of Julius Cæsar. He was an intimate friend of Cicero and Atticus, and dedicated to the latter his "Vitæ Excellentium Imperatorum," ("Lives of the Illustrious Generals.") This work, which is his only one extant, is distinguished for the purity and graceful simplicity of its style, and has been generally adopted as a class-book in schools and colleges.

See J. C. F. BAEHR, "Geschichte der Römischen Literatur;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Nepos, (FLAVIUS JULIUS,) was created Emperor of the West, A.D. 473, by Leo X., the Emperor of the East. He concluded a peace with Euric, King of the Visigoths, to whom he ceded a portion of Gaul. In 475 Orestes, a native of Pannonia, marched against Nepos, defeated him, and proclaimed his own son Romulus Emperor of the West. In 480 Nepos was assassinated at Salona.

See GIBBON, "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire."

Nep'tune, [Lat. NEPTU'NUS,] the god of the sea, a Roman divinity, identified with the Posei'don of the Greek mythology. He was said to be a son of Saturn and Rhea, the brother of Jupiter, and the father of Triton. His wife was Amphitrite. He was regarded as equal in dignity to Jupiter, but inferior in power. The poets feigned that he once conspired with Apollo and Juno against Jupiter, that he built the walls of Troy for Laomedon, and that he resented the perfidy of that king by fighting against the Trojans at the siege of Troy. Neptune and Minerva disputed for the possession of Attica, or for the honour of naming its capital, and the gods decided that the preference should be given to the one who should bestow on man the most valuable gift. Neptune, with a stroke of his trident, produced the war-horse, and Minerva created the olive, which was judged to be the more useful of the two. He is also fabled to have disputed with Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva for the sovereignty of several other countries. The symbol of his power was the trident, with which he shook the solid land and controlled the stormy sea. The poets describe him as riding in a chariot drawn by horses on the surface of the sea, the waves of which subside at his approach, and attended by a retinue of marine monsters which play around him. Besides his residence on Olympus, he had a fine palace in the depth of the sea near Ægæ.

Neptunus. See NEPTUNE.

Nera'tius (ne-rā'shĭe-us) Pris'cus, a Roman jurist under the reigns of Trajan and Adrian, whose favour and patronage he enjoyed. He was the author of numerous books on the Roman law, which have been often quoted by later jurists.

Ne're-ids, [Gr. Νηρηίδες, sing. Νηρεΐς; Lat. NERE'IDES; Fr. NÉRÉIDES, nā'rā'ĕd',] the daughters of Nereus, were sea-nymphs or mermaids of Greek mythology. The number of the Nereids was fifty. Among them were Amphitrite and Thetis, the mother of Achilles. The Nereids were represented originally as beautiful maidens, and sometimes as half woman and half fish.

Ne're-is or Ne-re'ĭ-ne, a name given to each of the NEREIDS, which see.

Ne'reŭs, [Gr. Νηρεύς; Fr. NÉRÉE, nā'rā',] a marine divinity of classic mythology, called a son of Pontus and the Earth, and the father of the Nereids. He was represented as a wise and prophetic old man of the sea, at the bottom of which he lived. The poets feigned that he could assume various forms, like Proteus, and would only reveal the future when, having exhausted his powers of transformation, he was reduced to his original shape. Hercules is said to have seized him and extorted from him some secret respecting the golden apples of the Hesperides.

Neri. See NEGRI, (PIETRO MARTINE.)

Neri, nā'ree, (ANTONIO,) an Italian chemist, born at Florence, lived about 1570–90. He wrote a work "On the Art of making Glass," (1592,) often reprinted.

Neri, [Lat. NE'RIUS,] (FILIPPO,) called SAINT PHILIP NERI, an Italian ecclesiastic, born at Florence in 1515. He founded about 1548 the Congregation of the Priests of the Oratory, the members of which, without taking a monastic vow, were required to live in the exercise of devotion and charity and apply themselves to theological studies. He was the first to introduce the musical entertainments called oratorios, from their being performed in a chapel or oratorio. He died in 1595, and Baronius, afterwards cardinal, succeeded him as general of the order. Neri was canonized by Gregory XV. in 1622.

Nerli, nĕR'lee, (FILIPPO,) an Italian historian, born at Florence in 1485, was a senator and an adherent of the Medici. He wrote a "History of Florence from 1215 to 1537," which was first published in 1728. Died in 1556.

See a "Life of Nerli" prefixed to his History.

Ne'ro, (CAIUS CLAUDIUS,) a Roman soldier, who in 214 B.C. commanded a force of cavalry in the war against Hannibal. In 212 B.C. he commanded in Spain against Hasdrubal. In 207 he was one of the consuls, and defeated Hannibal, after which he joined his forces with those of Marcus Livius, his colleague, and on the river Metaurus totally defeated the Carthaginian army under Hasdrubal, the brother of Hannibal, who was slain in the battle. This was one of the most important battles in universal history. It virtually ended the second Punic war, and saved Rome. Nero cut off the head of Hasdrubal and threw it into Hannibal's camp. Livius had the honour of a triumph for this victory, but historians generally have given to Nero the principal credit.

Ne'ro, [Fr. NÉRON, nā'rŏN'; It. NERONE, nā-ro'nā,] (LUCIUS DOMITIUS,) the sixth of the Roman emperors, born in 37 A.D., was the son of Domitius Ahenobarbus and Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus. His mother, after becoming a widow, having married her uncle the emperor Claudius, the latter adopted Nero and gave to him his daughter Octavia in marriage, adding to his name that of Claudius Drusus. On the death of Claudius, who was poisoned by Agrippina, A.D. 54, Nero was proclaimed emperor, to the exclusion of Britannicus, the son of Claudius. The counsels of Seneca and Burrus, who were placed at the head of government, had for a time a salutary effect upon Nero, and the first years of his rule were marked by kindness and justice; but his evil passions eventually prevailed, and the remainder of his reign was signalized by a series of atrocities. Becoming jealous of Britannicus, he caused him to be poisoned, and, having soon after formed an attachment to Poppæa, murdered his mother at her instigation and made her his wife. He next caused Octavia, whom he had divorced, to be put to death. In A.D. 64 Rome was nearly destroyed by a fire which Nero was accused of having kindled. It was said that he amused himself, while viewing the conflagration, with reciting verses descriptive of the fall of Troy. In order to remove suspicion from himself, he charged the crime upon the Christians, many of whom were in consequence subjected to the most cruel tortures. A conspiracy formed against the tyrant, A.D. 65, was discovered, and many distinguished citizens were executed, among whom were Lucan and Seneca. Soon after this, Vindex and Galba revolted against the emperor, who, on hearing of their defection and that of the prætorian guards, destroyed himself, with the assistance of a servant, A.D. 68.

Nero, a Roman prince, born about 7 A.D., was the eldest son of Germanicus and Agrippina. After the death of Drusus, the son of Tiberius, Nero was the next heir to the throne. He was put to death in 29 A.D., at the instigation of Sejanus, who contrived to excite the suspicion of Tiberius against Nero.

Nero, del, dĕl nā'ro, or Negro, nā'gro, (ANDALONE,) an Italian astronomer, born at Genoa about 1270. He taught astronomy at Rome and Naples. He is highly praised by Boccaccio, who was his pupil. Died after 1342.

Ner'va, (MARCUS COCCEIUS,) a Roman emperor, born in Umbria in 32 A.D. He was consul with Vespasian in 71, and with Domitian in 90 A.D. On the death of Domitian, in the year 96, he was proclaimed emperor by the army and the people. His administration was mild and liberal. He recalled exiles who had been banished by former emperors, and enforced penalties against informers. He made and performed a vow that he would not put any senator to death. His mutinous prætorian soldiers compelled him to permit the execution of the assassins of Domitian. He adopted Trajan as his son and successor, and died in 98 A.D.

Nes-to'rĭ-us, the founder of the sect of Nestorians, was born at Germanicia, in Syria, near the end of the fourth century. Having become a popular preacher, he was elected Patriarch of Constantinople in 428 A.D. He occasioned a schism by objecting to call the Virgin Mary the mother of God. The dispute was fomented by Cyril of Alexandria, who became a violent adversary of Nestorius. A council was called at Ephesus by the emperor Theodosius in 431; and, before the arrival of John of Antioch and several other bishops, Nestorius was deposed, on a charge of blasphemy. He was afterwards banished to an oasis in Egypt. The Nestorians became numerous in the East, and still exist as a distinct sect in Koordistan and Mesopotamia.

Newcastle, (THOMAS PELHAM,) DUKE OF, an English Whig minister of state, born in 1693, was the eldest son of Sir Thomas Pelham, of Sussex. His mother was a sister of John Hollis, Duke of Newcastle, who, dying in 1711, left a princely fortune to the subject of this article. In 1715 he was created Duke of Newcastle, and in 1724 appointed secretary of state. In 1754 he was promoted to the office of first lord of the treasury, (or premier,) which was then vacated by the death of his brother, Henry Pelham. He resigned reluctantly in November, 1756, and, after a ministerial crisis, formed a coalition with Pitt, and was again prime minister, or co-ordinate chief minister, from 1757 until May, 1762, when Lord Bute became premier. "His love of influence," says Macaulay, (in his Review of Walpole's "Letters to Horace Mann,") "was so intense a passion that it supplied the place of talents, that it inspired even fatuity with cunning. . . . All the able men of his time ridiculed him as a dunce, a driveller, a child who never knew his own mind for an hour together; and he overreached them all round." He died, without issue, in 1768, when the title passed to Henry Clinton, Earl of Lincoln, who had married a daughter and heiress of Henry Pelham.

Newcomb, nū'kŭm, (THOMAS,) an English poet, born in 1675, became rector of Stopham, in Sussex, about 1734. He wrote, besides other poems, "The Library," (1718,) and "The Last Judgment," (1723.) Died about 1766.

New'cọme, (PETER,) an English clergyman, born in 1656, was vicar of Aldenham, in Hertfordshire. He published several volumes of sermons, etc. Died in 1738.

Newcome, (WILLIAM,) a learned prelate and eminent biblical scholar, born in Bedfordshire in 1729. He became successively Bishop of Ossory and of Waterford, in Ireland, and in 1795 Archbishop of Armagh. He was the author of a "Historical View of the English Biblical Translations," and "Harmony of the Gospels," (1778.) Died in 1800.

See the "Monthly Review" for October, 1779.

New-com'ẹn, (MATTHEW,) an English nonconformist, was a member of the Westminster Assembly of divines. He was one of the five persons who wrote "Smectymnus," a controversial work against Bishop Hall. Died at Leyden in 1666.

Newcommen or Newcomen, nu-kom'ẹn, (THOMAS,) an English locksmith, born in Devonshire, was one of the inventors of the steam-engine. In 1705 Newcommen and Cawley (a glazier of that place) obtained a patent for an engine combining for the first time the cylinder and piston, with a separate boiler. The steam admitted below the piston was condensed by the application of cold water, and the pressure of the atmosphere, forcing down the piston, moved a working-beam, to one end of which a pump-rod was attached. This engine was much used in mines.

See J. ROBISON, "System of Mechanical Philosophy."

New'dĭ-gate, (Sir ROGER,) an English gentleman of fine taste and classical attainments, born in Warwickshire in 1719. He was for many years representative in Parliament for the University of Oxford. He was a generous patron of that institution, to which he gave the Florentine Museum, Piranesi's works, and the candelabra in the Radcliffe Library. Died in 1780.

New'ell, (HARRIET,) wife of Samuel Newell, noticed below, was born at Haverhill, Massachusetts, in 1793. She accompanied her husband to India in 1812, and died soon after their arrival. Her "Memoirs" were written by Dr. Woods, of Andover.

New'ell, (ROBERT HASSELL,) an English clergyman, born in 1780. He edited the works of Oliver Goldsmith, (1811,) and wrote "The Zoology of the British Poets corrected," etc., (1845.) Died in 1852.

Newell, (SAMUEL,) an American missionary, born at Durham, Maine, in 1784. Having graduated at Harvard College, he was ordained in 1812, and soon after set sail for Calcutta, accompanied by the Rev. Adoniram Judson. He published, conjointly with Mr. Hall, "The Conversion of the World, or the Claims of Six Hundred Millions," (1818.) Died in 1821.

New'land, (JOHN,) an English monk and diplomatist, was abbot of a monastery at Bristol. He was employed by Henry VIII. in diplomatic missions. Died in 1515.

New'land, [Dutch, NIEUWLAND, nyö'lânt,] (PETER,) a Dutch mathematician and poet, born near Amsterdam in 1764. He wrote, besides other works, a "Treatise on Navigation." Died in 1794.

New'man, (FRANCIS W.,) an English author, brother of John Henry, noticed below, was born in London in 1805. He was educated at Oxford, and, after he left college, passed three years in the Turkish empire, (1830–33.) In 1840 he became professor of languages at Manchester New College. He was appointed professor of Latin in University College, London, in 1846. Among his principal works are a "History of the Hebrew Monarchy," (1847,) "The Soul: its Sorrows and Aspirations," (1849,) "Phases of Faith, or Passages from the History of my Creed," (1850,) "Lectures on Ancient and Modern History," (1851,) "Crimes of the House of Hapsburg," (1853,) "Theism, Doctrinal and Practical," (1858,) "English Institutions and their Reforms," (1865,) "Hand-Book of Modern Arabic," (1866,) etc.

Newman, (JOHN HENRY,) an eminent English theologian, born in London in 1801. He entered Trinity College, Oxford, in 1816, and was elected a Fellow of Oriel College in 1822. At Oriel College he formed a friendship with John Keble the poet, and with Dr. Whately. He was ordained a priest in 1824, and became vice-principal of Alban Hall in 1825, and a tutor of Oriel College in 1826. In 1828 he was appointed vicar of Saint Mary's, Oxford, and of Littlemore. In 1833 Newman, Keble, and Pusey initiated the "Oxford movement" in favour of High-Church doctrines, which they advocated in a series of "Tracts for the Times." He manifested a growing tendency to Roman Catholicism in his "Arians of the Fourth Century: their Doctrines, Temper, and Conduct," (1833,) his "Tract No. 90," (1841,) and his "Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine." He became a member of the Roman Catholic Church in 1845, and was the principal of the Oratory of Saint Philip Neri at Birmingham from 1848 to 1852. In the latter year he was fined one hundred pounds for a libel on Dr. Achilli. He defended or explained his religious course in a work entitled "Apology for his Life," ("Apologia pro Vita sua," 1864.) He published a collection of poems, (1868,) "The Grammar of Assent," (1870,) and "A Letter addressed to his Grace the Duke of Norfolk, on the Occasion of Mr. Gladstone's Recent Expostulation," (1875.) He was made a cardinal-deacon in 1879. Died August 11, 1890.

New'march, (WILLIAM,) an English political economist, born in 1820. His most important work was the preparation of the two concluding volumes of "Tooke and Newmarch's History of Prices," (1856.) Died March 23, 1882.

New'pōrt, (CHRISTOPHER,) an Englishman, commanded the vessels which in 1606 conveyed the party of emigrants that first settled at Jamestown, Virginia.

Newport, (GEORGE,) F.R.S., an English comparative anatomist and entomologist, born at Canterbury in 1803. He practised medicine, and devoted much time to the study of the anatomy of insects, on which subjects he contributed to the "Philosophical Transactions" a number of memoirs. One of these was "On the Nervous System of the Sphinx." He was elected president of the Entomological Society in 1844. Died in 1854.

Newport, (Sir JOHN,) an Irish Whig politician, born at Waterford about 1760. He became a member of Parliament in 1803, and controller of the exchequer. Died in 1843.

New'tŏn, (CHARLES THOMAS,) a British archæologist, born in 1816. He graduated in 1837 at Christ Church, Oxford, and was employed (1840–52) in the British Museum. Becoming vice-consul at Mitylene, he made important explorations in Asia Minor. In 1880 he was appointed professor of archæology in the University of Oxford. Among his writings are a "History of Discoveries at Halicarnassus," etc., (2 vols., 1862,) "Travels in the Levant," (1865,) "Essays on Art and Archæology," (1880,) etc.

New'tŏn, (GILBERT STUART,) a distinguished painter, of English extraction, born at Halifax, Nova Scotia, in 1794. He painted numerous small pictures of great merit, among which we may name "Shylock and Jessica" and "Portia and Bassanio." Died in 1835.

Newton, (HUBERT ANSON,) LL.D., an American mathematician, born at Sherburne, New York, March 19, 1830. He graduated at Yale College in 1850, and became professor of mathematics there in 1855.

Newton, (Sir ISAAC,) an illustrious English philosopher and mathematician, born at Woolsthorpe, in Lincolnshire, on the 25th of December, 1642, (Old Style.) He was the posthumous and only child of Isaac Newton, a farmer, who died in 1642. His mother, whose original name was Hannah Ayscough, was married again to the Rev. Barnabas Smith in 1645. He attended the schools of Skillington and Stoke for several years, and about the age of twelve entered the grammar-school of Grantham. There he manifested much mechanical ingenuity by the construction of a windmill, a water-clock, a sundial, and other pieces of mechanism. He also wrote verses in his boyhood. He entered Trinity College, Cambridge, as a sub-sizar, in June, 1661, before which date it does not appear that he had been a profound student of mathematics. It has been stated that he commenced the study of Euclid's "Elements," but he found the first propositions so self-evident that he threw the book aside as too trifling. "When Newton entered Trinity College," says Brewster, "he brought with him a more slender portion of science than at his age falls to the lot of ordinary scholars." Among the works which he first studied at Cambridge were the "Optics" of Kepler and the "Geometry" of Descartes. In 1664 he read Wallis's "Arithmetica Infinitorum," and discovered the method of infinite series, or the binomial theorem, which enabled him to compute the area of curves and to solve with ease problems which before were insoluble or very difficult. He took the degree of B.A. in 1665, and discovered the differential calculus, or method of fluxions, probably in the same year. This important method of mathematical investigation was discovered by Leibnitz about the same time, and before Newton had published anything on the subject. A controversy arose between the English and foreign mathematicians about the priority of the discovery. Sir David Brewster gives this decision of the question: 1. That Newton was the first inventor of the method of fluxions; that the method was incomplete in its notation, and that the fundamental principle of it was not published to the world till 1687. 2. That Leibnitz communicated his differential calculus to Newton in 1677, with a complete system of notation, and that he published it in 1684.

As a precaution against the plague, he retired from Cambridge to his native place in the summer of 1665. He then and there began to speculate on the subject of gravity. It was in the autumn of 1665 that the apple which suggested to him the idea of gravitation is said to have fallen from the tree at Woolsthorpe. "When sitting alone in the garden," says Brewster, "and speculating on the power of gravity, it occurred to him that as the same power by which the apple fell to the ground was not sensibly diminished at the greatest distance from the centre of the earth to which we can reach, . . . it might extend to the moon and retain her in her orbit in the same manner as it bends into a curve a stone or cannon-ball when projected in a straight line from the surface of the earth." He arrived at the conclusion that the force of gravity by which the planets were retained in their orbits varied as the squares of their distances from the sun; but, not being prepared to verify this hypothesis, he abandoned or deferred the subject for many years.

He returned to Cambridge in 1666, and applied himself to the grinding of optic glasses, and began to study the subject of colours in connection with the prismatic spectrum. He was elected a Minor Fellow in October, 1667, and took his degree of M.A. in March, 1668, as twenty-third on the list of one hundred and forty-eight graduates. He made a small reflecting telescope in 1668, and succeeded Dr. Barrow, as Lucasian professor of mathematics, in 1669. About this date he made the grand discovery that light is not homogeneous, but consists of rays of different refrangibility. He also perceived that this different refrangibility was the real cause of the imperfection of refracting telescopes. In 1671 he constructed with his own hands a second reflecting telescope, which is preserved in the library of the Royal Society. Newton read a course of lectures on optics, at Cambridge, in 1669, 1670, and 1671. He was the author of the theory of light called the Emission theory, according to which light is composed of, or produced by, material particles of inconceivable minuteness, emitted by luminous bodies in all directions. On this subject he was involved in a controversy with Hooke and Huygens, who maintained the undulatory theory. In a letter to Leibnitz, dated December 9, 1675, he writes, "I was so persecuted with discussions arising out of my theory of light, that I blamed my own imprudence for parting with so substantial a blessing as my quiet to run after a shadow." He was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society in January, 1672. In December, 1675, he communicated to that body a discourse entitled a "Theory of Light and Colours." "The theory of Newton," says Sir John Herschel, "gives a complete and elegant explanation of what may be considered the chief of all optical facts,—the production of colours in the ordinary refraction of light by a prism, the discovery of which by him marks one of the greatest epochs in the annals of experimental science." ("Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy.") His optical discoveries are described in a work entitled "Opticks, or a Treatise on the Reflexions, Refractions, Inflexions, and Colours of Light," which was published in 1704, but written many years earlier. "To avoid being engaged in disputes about these matters," says the author, "I have hitherto delayed the printing." The only other optical work by Newton was his "Lectiones Opticæ," (1728,) which contains the lectures he read at Cambridge in 1669–71.

Newton had abandoned the subject of gravity in 1665, after an attempt to verify his theory by a calculation which failed because he had employed an erroneous measure of the earth's radius. About 1684 he resumed his inquiries and calculations in relation to the moon, and employed Picard's more accurate measure of the earth's diameter. He thus demonstrated the great truth that the orbit of the moon is curved by the same force which causes bodies to fall on the surface of the earth. According to a doubtful tradition, he became so much agitated as his calculations drew to a close, that he was obliged to ask a friend to finish them. "This anecdote is not supported by what is known of Newton's character," (Brewster's "Life of Newton.") He announced this discovery to the Royal Society in 1685 by his treatise "De Motu." This was the germ of his greatest work, the "Principia," (composed in 1685–86,) which Laplace regarded as "pre-eminent above all other productions of the human intellect." The full title of this work, which was published by the Royal Society or by Halley in 1687, is "The Mathematical Principles of Natural Philosophy," ("Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica.") It consists of three Books, of which the first and second are entitled "On the Motion of Bodies," and the third "On the System of the World." "The great discovery," says Brewster, "which characterizes the 'Principia' is that of the principle of universal gravitation, that every particle of matter in the universe is attracted by, or gravitates to, every other particle of matter, with a force inversely proportional to the squares of their distances."

"The glory of these men," says Macaulay, referring to Wallis and Halley, "is cast into the shade by the transcendent lustre of one immortal name. In Isaac Newton two kinds of intellectual power, which have little in common, and which are not often found together in a very high degree of vigour, but which nevertheless are equally necessary in the most sublime departments of natural philosophy, were united as they have never been united before or since. . . . In no other mind have the demonstrative faculty and the inductive faculty coexisted in such supreme excellence and perfect harmony." ("History of England," vol. i. chap. iii.)

In 1687 James II. sent an illegal mandamus to the University of Cambridge, directing that a certain monk should be admitted a master of arts without taking the oath of allegiance. Newton took an active and influential part in defending the privileges of the university on this occasion. He represented Cambridge in the Convention Parliament, January, 1689–February, 1690, and maintained the principles of civil and religious liberty in that critical period of revolution. In 1689 he became acquainted with John Locke, with whom he associated on friendly terms and corresponded until his death. Newton, though satiated with fame, had gained no pecuniary benefit by his writings, and had received no mark of national gratitude for his discoveries. Locke and Charles Montague endeavoured to procure for him some permanent appointment, but without success.

In 1692 and 1693 he wrote to Bentley four celebrated letters on the formation of the sun and the planets, etc., in which he affirms that the motions of the planets could not be produced by any natural cause alone, but were impressed by an intelligent agent and Divine power. A report was circulated, chiefly on the continent, that Newton was insane, about 1692. The story that his precious manuscripts were burned through the agency of his little dog Diamond, seems to be equally unfounded. "He never had any communion with dogs or cats." (Brewster.)

In 1694 Newton was occupied by researches on the lunar theory, and obtained from Flamsteed his observations on the moon. Letters were exchanged between them in relation to these observations, which became the occasion of an intemperate and discreditable controversy. Newton was appointed warden of the mint in 1695 or 1696 by his friend Montague, Earl of Halifax, who had resolved on an important scheme of re-coinage of clipped and debased coin. The salary of this office was about £600. In 1699 he was promoted to be master of the mint, with a salary of from £1200 to £1500. In 1703 he was returned to Parliament by the University of Cambridge, and was elected President of the Royal Society. He continued until his death to occupy the latter position, to which he was annually re-elected. He was knighted by Queen Anne in 1705. Among his important works are "The Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms Amended," (1728,) and "Observations upon the Prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse of Saint John," (first published in 1733.) "That the greatest philosopher of which any age can boast," says Brewster, "was a sincere and humble believer in the leading doctrines of our religion and lived conformably to its precepts, has been justly regarded as a proud triumph of the Christian faith." Newton's religious opinions, however, were not strictly orthodox: like Milton, he appears to have had a decided leaning towards Arianism.

Newton was never married. His latter years were passed in London, where he lived in a handsome style and kept six servants. He was extremely generous and liberal in the use of money, for which he is said to have had a great contempt. On one occasion he offered Dr. Cheselden, as a fee, a handful of guineas out of his coat-pocket. He was often so absorbed in meditation that he forgot to eat, and it was necessary for his servants to remind him of his meals. He died at Kensington on the 20th of March, 1727, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His collected works were published by Bishop Horsley in 5 vols. 4to, (1779–85.)

Near the end of his life he said, "I know not what I may appear to the world, but to myself I seem to have been only like a boy playing on the sea-shore and diverting myself in now and then finding a smoother pebble or a prettier shell than ordinary, whilst the great ocean of truth lay all undiscovered before me."

"Though there be few," says Dr. Chalmers, "who comprehend or follow Newton in his gigantic walk, yet all may participate in his triumphant feeling when he reached that lofty summit where the whole mystery and magnificence of nature stood submitted to his gaze,—an eminence won by him through the power and patience of intellect alone, but from which he descried a scene more glorious far than imagination could have formed, or than ever had been pictured and set forth in the sublimest visions of poetry." ("Treatise on the Adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man.")

"Whichever way we turn our view," says Sir John F. W. Herschel, "we find ourselves compelled to bow before his genius, and to assign to the name of Newton a place in our veneration which belongs to no other in the annals of science. His era marks the accomplished maturity of the human reason as applied to such objects. . . . His wonderful combination of mathematical skill with physical research enabled him to invent at pleasure new and unheard-of methods of investigating the effects of those causes which his clear and penetrating mind detected in operation. Ascending by a series of close-compacted inductive arguments to the highest axioms of dynamical science, he succeeded in applying them to the complete explanation of all the great astronomical phenomena." ("Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy.")

Newton, (John,) an English mathematician, born in Northamptonshire in 1622, was the author of "Geometrical Trigonometry," "Astronomia Britannica," and other works. Died in 1678.

See Wood, "Athenæ Oxonienses."

Newton, (John,) an English divine, born in London in 1725. Having for many years led a profligate life as a sailor, and engaging in the African slave-trade, he was converted, and distinguished himself thenceforth by his zeal in the cause of religion. In 1764 he became curate of Olney, where he acquired the friendship of Cowper, and wrote, in conjunction with him, the "Olney Hymns." He also published a "Review of Ecclesiastical History," (1770,) "Cardiphonia," etc., and other works. Died in 1807.

New'ton, (John,) an American general, born in Virginia, graduated at West Point in 1842. He became a brigadier-general of Union volunteers in 1861, and commanded a brigade in the battles before Richmond, June, 1862, and a division at Gettysburg, July 1–3, 1863. He served under General Sherman in Georgia in 1864, with distinction, and was brevetted brigadier-general and major-general in 1865. Since the war he has been engaged in removing the obstructions to navigation in Hell Gate. He became lieutenant-colonel of engineers in 1865, and colonel in 1879.

Newton, (Reginald Heber,) D.D., an American clergyman, a son of Rev. Dr. Richard Newton, was born in Philadelphia, October 31, 1840. He was educated at the University of Pennsylvania. Ordained to the ministry of the Episcopal Church, his extreme "Broad Church" position attracted much attention. Among his works are "The Children's Church," (1872,) "The Morals of Trade," (1876,) "Womanhood," (1880,) "Studies of Jesus," (1881,) "The Right and Wrong Uses of the Bible," (1883,) and "The Book of Beginnings," (1884.) He has written much on social and industrial questions.

Newton, (Richard,) an English divine, born about 1675, became canon of Christ Church, Oxford. He published a work entitled "Pluralities Indefensible," (1744.) He was the founder of Hertford College, Oxford. Died in 1753.

See Chalmers, "History of Oxford."

Newton, (Richard,) D.D., an American clergyman, born in Liverpool, England, July 25, 1813. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1834, and at the General Theological Seminary, New York, in 1839, and held Episcopalian pastorships, chiefly in Philadelphia. He published twenty-two volumes, many of them containing sermons for the young, which have had a wide popularity and have been translated into many foreign languages. Died May 25, 1887.

New'ton, (Robert,) a Scottish Methodist clergyman born in 1780. He preached in London and Liverpool, and was appointed in 1839 a delegate to the General Conference of the United States. He was a popular preacher. Died in 1854.

Newton, (Thomas,) an English divine, born at Lichfield in 1704, rose through various preferments to be Bishop of Bristol, (1761.) He published an excellent edition of Milton's "Paradise Lost," with notes, (1749,) and "Dissertations on the Prophecies," etc., (3 vols., 1754–58,) which were translated into German and Danish. Died in 1782.

See "Life of Thomas Newton," prefixed to the second edition of his Works; "Monthly Review" for February and March, 1783.

Newton, (Thomas,) an English littérateur, born in Essex, became master of Macclesfield School. He was the author of a "History of the Saracens," (1575,) of a number of Latin poems, and other works. Died in 1607.

See Warton, "History of English Poetry."

Newton, (William,) an English architect and writer, published an English translation of Vitruvius, (2 vols., 1771.)

Newton, (William Wilberforce,) an American clergyman, a brother of R. H. Newton, was born in Philadelphia, November 4, 1843. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1865, and at the Philadelphia Divinity School in 1868, and became a presbyter of the Episcopal Church. Among his works are "Essays of To-Day," (1879,) "The Voice of Saint John," a poem, (1880,) "Priest and Man," a novel, (1883,) "The Legend of Saint Telemachus," a poem, (1882,) and some volumes of sermons for children.

Ney, nā, (François,) a Flemish diplomatist, born at Antwerp, became general of the order of Saint Francis, in Spain, in 1607. He was the principal agent of the Spanish king in the negotiation of the treaty of peace which recognized the independence of the revolted Dutch provinces in 1609. Watson the historian speaks highly of his talents and address.

See Grotius, "Histoire des Troubles des Pays-Bas."

Ney, nā, (Joseph Napoléon,) Prince of the Moskwa, (in French, "de la Moskowa,") a French general, born in Paris in 1803, was the eldest son of Marshal Ney. He served in Algeria in 1837–38, and entered the Chamber of Peers in 1841. After the revolution of 1848 he was elected a member of the Legislative Assembly, in which he was a partisan of Louis Napoleon. Died in 1857.

Ney, (Michel,) Duke of Elchingen, Prince of the Moskwa, a famous French marshal, born at Sarre-Louis in January, 1769, was the son of a cooper. He entered the army as a private in 1787, became adjutant-general in 1794, and a general of brigade in 1796. As general of division, he acquired a high reputation under Massena, in Switzerland and Germany, in 1799. In 1800 he passed into the army of Moreau, and contributed to the victory of Hohenlinden. He obtained a marshal's bâton in 1804. For an important victory over the Austrians at Elchingen, in October, 1805, he received the title of Duke of Elchingen. His impetuous courage rendered essential services at the battle of Jena, in 1806. In this year he took Magdeburg, the garrison of which amounted to about 20,000 men. He commanded an army in Spain in 1809, and obtained advantages at Ciudad Rodrigo and Almeida in 1810. In the Russian campaign of 1812 he received from Bonaparte the appellation of the "Bravest of the Brave." He commanded the centre at the great battle of Borodino, or the Moskwa, from which he derived his title of Prince. In the retreat from Moscow, Marshal Ney commanded the rear-guard, and maintained his reputation by heroic conduct amidst the greatest disasters. "It was when danger was greatest and success most doubtful," says Alison, "that his courage was most conspicuous and his coolness most valuable." When summoned to capitulate, in November, 1812, he replied, "A marshal of France never surrenders!"

He took a prominent part in the battles of Lutzen, Bautzen, and Dresden, in 1813, and was defeated at Dennewitz by Bernadotte in September of that year. On the abdication of Napoleon, in 1814, Ney submitted to Louis XVIII., who permitted him to retain his titles and military rank. In March, 1815, he received orders to lead an army against Napoleon, whom he promised to bring back in an iron cage. His moral courage, however, was not proof against the seductive offers of his former chief, to whom he transferred the army, as well as his own services. He fought with his usual resolution at Waterloo, where he led several charges of the Old Guard and had five horses shot under him. He was tried for treason by the court of the peers, and shot on the 7th of December, 1815.

"When the Parisians awoke," says Lamartine, "and found that Ney had been executed, bitter shame seized on every soul. . . . We must say, however, in the defence of the king and the ministers, that they were repugnant, from moderation, honour, and sensibility, to this useless, cruel, and shameful sacrifice. In their eyes, and in those of the impartial portion of the world, Ney was a great culprit, but his was a glorious life. His fault was among those which are condemned but pardoned. He had redeemed it beforehand by exploits which will be an eternal theme in the camps of France." ("History of the Restoration.")

Ney, (MICHEL LOUIS FÉLIX,) Duc d'Elchingen, a son of the preceding, was born in 1804. He served several campaigns in Algeria, and became a general of brigade in 1851. Died in 1854.

Ney, (NAPOLÉON HENRI EDGAR,) Prince of the Moskwa, a son of Marshal Ney, was born in Paris in 1812. He entered the army about 1830, was elected to the Legislative Assembly in 1850, became aide-de-camp to the emperor in 1852, and general of brigade in 1856 Died in 1882.

Neyen, nī'ĕn or nā'ŏN', (AUGUSTE,) a Belgian historian, born at Luxemburg in 1809. Among his works is "Biographie Luxembourgeoise," (2 vols., 1861.)

Neyn, nīn, (PIETER,) a Dutch painter and architect, born at Leyden in 1597; died in 1639.

Nī-can'dẹr, [Gr. Νίκανδρος; Fr. NICANDRE, ne'kŏNDR',] a celebrated Greek physician and poet, born near Colophon, is supposed to have flourished about 175–135 B.C. Of his numerous works only two have come down to us entire. These are two poems, entitled "Theriaca" and "Alexipharmaca." The latter treats of venomous animals and the remedies for their wounds. As a poet, he is eulogized by Cicero, but severely criticised by other writers. His works are said to be obscure and pedantic. Among his lost works was a poem of Georgics, which Virgil is said to have imitated.

Nī-çe′tas A-com-ī-nā′tus, [Ἀκομινάτος,] surnamed CHONI′ATES, a Byzantine historian of the twelfth century, wrote a "History of the Greek Emperors from 1117 to 1203," in twenty-one books; also a "Description of the Monuments destroyed by the Franks at the Taking of Constantinople." Died about 1216.

Nich′ol, (JOHN,) LL.D., a son of Prof. J. P. Nichol, was born at Montrose, Scotland, September 8, 1833. He studied (1848–55) at the University of Glasgow, and at Balliol College, Oxford, and in 1861 became professor of English literature in the University of Glasgow. He published "Byron," (1880,) "Robert Burns," (1882,) "American Literature," (1882,) and other works in prose and verse.

Nich′ol, (JOHN PRINGLE,) a British astronomer and philosopher, born at Brechin, in Scotland, in 1804, was educated for the ministry. He gained distinction as a lecturer on science, and as a writer. About 1836 he was appointed professor of astronomy in the University of Glasgow. He published popular works entitled "The Architecture of the Heavens," (1836,) "The Stellar Heavens," "The Solar System," and a "Dictionary of the Physical Sciences." His style is vigorous and attractive. He wrote numerous articles for the "Imperial Dictionary of Biography." Died in 1859.

Nich′o-las [Lat. NICOLA′US; Fr. NICOLAS, ne′ko′lâ′; It. NICCOLÒ, nĕk-ko-lo′; Ger. NIKOLAUS, nik′o-lŏwss′] I., POPE, succeeded Benedict III. in 858 A.D. Not long after, he was engaged in a broil with Photius, who had intruded himself into the patriarchal see of Constantinople, and the result was a schism between the Greek and Latin Churches. He died in 867, and was succeeded by Adrian II.

Nicholas I., (in Montenegrin, Nik′i-ta,) Prince of Montenegro, (name in full NIKITA PETROVITCH NIEGOSH or NYEGOOSH,) was born October 7, 1841. In 1860 he succeeded his uncle Danilo. His reign has been signalized by bloody wars with Turkey. The Congress of Berlin, at the end of the Russo-Turkish war of 1876–78, more than doubled the area of his dominions. Nicholas at that time became an absolute and independent monarch. He has done much for popular education, and has the reputation of being no mean poet.

Nicholas II., POPE, (called GERARD OF BURGUNDY,) succeeded Stephen IX. in 1059. Under his rule a decree was passed concerning the method of electing popes. Nicholas bestowed upon Robert Guiscard the duchy of Apulia and Calabria as a fief of the Roman see. He died in 1061, and was succeeded by Alexander II.

Nicholas III. (GIOVANNI Gaetani—gâ-à-tâ′nee) succeeded John XXI. as pope in 1277. He obtained from the emperor Rudolph of Germany the confirmation of the Exarchate of Ravenna, and other grants of territory, said to have been made by former emperors. He died in 1280, and was succeeded by Martin IV.

Nicholas IV., POPE, (called JEROME OF ASCOLI,) succeeded Honorius IV. in 1288. He wrote a number of commentaries on the Scriptures. He died in 1292, and was succeeded by Celestine V.

See J. ROSSI, (RUBEUS,) "Vita Nicolai Papæ IV.," 1761.

Nicholas V. (called THOMAS OF SARZANA) succeeded Eugenius IV. in 1447. Having persuaded Felix V., who had been made pope by the Council of Bâle in 1439, to resign in his favour, he thus restored peace to the Western Church. He was a munificent patron of learning, and the founder of the Vatican Library. Died in 1455, aged about fifty-seven.

* Some of the best French authorities are not consistent with themselves in regard to the spelling of this name. In the early part of the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale" the name, whenever referred to, appears to be invariably written with the accent on the second syllable,—NICÉRON,—but under the biographical notice it is spelled NICERON which is also the spelling of the "Biographie Universelle." But this fact will not by any means be deemed decisive by those who are aware of the exceeding negligence of most French writers in regard to marking the accent. It has become very common in France to omit the accent in certain names (e.g. PETION) in writing, but to pronounce the name as if spelled with an accent. (See note under "Petion" in the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale.")

Nicholas [in Russian, NIKOLAI PAVLOVITCH, ne-ko-lā'e (or ne-ko-lī') pāv'lo-vitch] I., Emperor of Russia, born at or near Saint Petersburg in July, 1796, was the third son of Paul I. His mother was Mary of Würtemberg. He was instructed in the languages, sciences, etc. by the philologist Adelung and the counsellor Storch. He learned to speak French and German fluently. In 1817 he married a daughter of Frederick William, King of Prussia, who, on joining the Greek Church, changed her name to Alexandra. On the death of Alexander I., in December, 1825, Nicholas succeeded him without opposition from his elder brother, Constantine, who was notoriously unfit to reign, and who had been induced by Alexander to renounce his claim to the throne. His accession, however, was the occasion of a dangerous revolt among the troops of the capital, instigated by an extensive conspiracy, or secret society, the design of which was to make a radical change in the government This revolt was not suppressed without much bloodshed, and many nobles implicated in the conspiracy were exiled to Siberia. This affair tended to confirm his despotic propensities.

Among the first events of his reign was a war against Persia, from which he conquered the province of Erivan in 1827. In 1828 war broke out between Russia and Turkey. The Russian army, after several successes, crossed the Balkan and took Adrianople. Peace was restored in September, 1829, by the treaty of Adrianople, in accordance with which a large territory on the eastern coast of the Black Sea was added to the Russian empire. In November, 1830, commenced a great insurrection of the Poles, who were subjugated by the Russian armies under Diebitsch and Paskevitch and were punished with great severity. In 1832 order again reigned in Warsaw. The ambition of Nicholas also involved him in a long war for the conquest of Circassia, which he did not live to complete. His disregard of the claims of liberty and justice was palpably exhibited in his armed intervention against the Hungarians, who were subjugated by the Russian and Austrian armies in 1849.

Nicholas had long entertained ambitious designs respecting Turkey, which at length involved him in a disastrous war. In the spring of 1853 he demanded of the Sultan the protectorate of all the Turkish subjects who professed the Greek religion. The Sultan refused to submit to this demand, and France and England united to defend him against the aggressions of Russia. Hostilities commenced in October, 1853. Nicholas, who probably did not expect that France and England would fight, was ill prepared for a war of such magnitude. The Russian army crossed the Danube in the spring of 1854, and besieged Silistria without success. The English and French fleets entered the Black Sea, and landed the allied armies in the Crimea, in September, 1854. The allies gained decisive victories at Alma and Inkerman, and commenced the long and famous siege of Sebastopol. In the mean time another English fleet gained victories in the Baltic, and threatened the capital of Russia. Nicholas was overtasked by the labours which his imperious will and despotic policy imposed on him as sole director and dictator of so vast an empire. Before the end of the war he died, on the 2d of March, 1855, and was succeeded by his son, Alexander II. He left four sons, Alexander, Constantine, Nicholas, and Michael. Nicholas I. was a man of tall stature and imposing presence, with great capacity of endurance.

Nicholson, (WILLIAM,) a British portrait-painter, born at Newcastle-on-Tyne in 1784. He lived mostly at Edinburgh, and published "Portraits of Distinguished Living Characters of Scotland," (1818,) a series of etchings. Died at Edinburgh, August 16, 1844.

Nicholson, (WILLIAM RUFUS,) D.D., an American bishop, was born in Green county, Mississippi, January 8, 1822. He graduated at La Grange College, Alabama, in 1840, was a Methodist clergyman in New Orleans, 1843–46, took orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church in 1847, and held rectorships in Cincinnati, Boston, and Newark. In 1874 he joined the "Reformed Episcopal Church" and became minister of a parish in Philadelphia. In 1876 he was made a bishop. He published various pamphlets, controversial and expository.

Nicias, nish'e-as, or Nik'ĭ-as, [Νικίας,] a celebrated Athenian general, was the son of Niceratus, who left him a large fortune. His moderate and cautious character and conservative principles identified him with the aristocratic party. On the death of Pericles he became a prominent opponent of Cleon, the democratic leader. By prudence rather than by skill, he generally obtained success in his earlier military operations against the Spartans. In 426 B.C. he commanded a successful expedition against Melos, and in 425 invaded Corinth, the army of which he defeated. Cleon, his principal rival, having died, Nicias exerted his influence in favour of peace, and a treaty was made between Athens and Sparta in 421 B.C. This was called the peace of Nicias. A long contest ensued between him and Alcibiades, the leader of the democracy, who wished to renew the war, and who prevailed in 415, when an expedition was sent against Syracuse, the ally of Sparta. Nicias, Alcibiades, and Lamachus were chosen joint commanders; but the second was recalled before the fleet arrived at Syracuse. In the spring of 414 Nicias blockaded the port of Syracuse, seized the heights of Epipolæ, and had nearly enclosed the city on the land side by a wall, when Gylippus, the Spartan general, arrived. Nicias was disabled by ill health and wished to resign, but was compelled to retain the command. The Athenians were defeated in several actions on land and water, and the timidity or incapacity of Nicias caused the total loss of his large army. He was made prisoner, and put to death in 414 or 413 B.C.

Nicias, a celebrated Greek painter, born at Athens, flourished probably between 350 and 300 B.C. He was a pupil of Antidotus, and is also called the most eminent disciple of Euphranor. According to Pliny, he was employed by Praxiteles to colour or varnish marble statues, (in statuis circumlinendis.) This was probably in his youth, before he had attained celebrity. He painted chiefly in encaustic, and was very skilful in representing female figures. He excelled in design and chiaroscuro. His master-piece was a picture of the infernal regions as described by Homer, "Necromantia Homeri," which, says Plutarch, he refused to sell to Ptolemy of Egypt, although he was offered the enormous price of sixty talents. Among his other works were a "Calypso," a "Diana," and a "Hyacinthus."

See SILLIG, "Catalogus Artificum:" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Nicias, physician to Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, proposed to Fabricius, the Roman general, to poison his master for a sum of money. His treachery being disclosed by Fabricius, he was put to death.

Nī-coĕh'a-rēs, [Νικοχάρης,] an Athenian comic poet, was a son of the poet Philonides, and a contemporary of Aristophanes. He flourished about 375 B.C. His works are lost.

Nic'o-clēs, [Gr. Νικοκλῆς,] King of Salamis, in Cyprus, was a son of Evagoras I. He began to reign about 375 B.C. Isocrates wrote a panegyric on him.

Nic-o-de'mus, [Fr. NICODÈME, ne'ko'dȧm',] (ADAM BURCHARD SELLY,) a Russian monk and historian, of Danish origin. His chief work is "De Rossorum Hierarchia," (5 vols.) Died in 1746.

Nic'ọl, (WILLIAM,) a Scottish natural philosopher, born about 1768. He invented the polarizing prism, and left important papers on light and kindred subjects. Died at Edinburgh in 1851.

Nicolai, nee'ko-lī', (CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH,) a celebrated German littérateur, born at Berlin in 1733. Having at an early age acquired the friendship of Lessing and Moses Mendelssohn, he published, conjointly with the latter, the first four volumes of the "Library of Belles-Lettres," (1758.) "The Universal German Library," ("Allgemeine Deutsche Bibliothek,") in which he was assisted by several eminent writers, came out in 1792, in 106 vols. A continuation of this standard work was published in 1805, making in all 162 vols. Among his other writings may be named a "Description of Berlin and Potsdam," "Life and Opinions of Sebaldus Nothanker," (3 vols., 1773,) a "Tour through Germany and Switzerland," (12 vols., 1783,) and "Anecdotes of Frederick II.," (1788.) The conservative spirit of Nicolai's criticisms, and his hostility to all innovations in German literature, exposed him to the severe strictures of Goethe, Schiller, and other writers of the time. Died in 1811.

Nic-o-me'dēs [Gr. Νικομήδης; Fr. NICOMÈDE, ne'ko'mȧd'] I., King of Bithynia, began to reign at the death of his father, 278 B.C. He was opposed by his brother Zipœtes, and took into his service an army of Gauls, by whose aid he gained the victory. He founded the great city of Nicomedia. Died about 250 B.C.

See DROYSEN, "Hellenismus."

Nic-o-me'dēs II. E-piph'a-nēs [Fr. NICOMÈDE ÉPIPHANE, ne'ko'mȧd' ȧ'pe'făn'] was a son of Prusias II., who sent him to Rome as a hostage. He gained the favour of the Roman senate, and excited the jealousy of his father, who sent an agent to assassinate him. Informed of this design, Nicomedes dethroned and killed Prusias in 149 B.C. He was afterwards an ally of the Romans. Died about 90 B.C.

See JUSTIN, books xxxiv., xxxvii., etc.

Nicomedes III., surnamed PHILOP'ATOR, was a son of the preceding, whom he succeeded in 91 B.C. In the Mithridatic war, which ensued soon after, he was an ally of Rome, but, having been defeated, he was driven from his kingdom. Bithynia was subsequently restored to Nicomedes, who, dying without children, (74 B.C.,) left it to the Romans.

Nicomedes, a Greek geometer, the inventor of the curve called the "conchoid," flourished about 100 B.C.

Nī'con [Νίκων] OF PERGAMUS, a Greek architect and geometer, was the father of the celebrated Galen. Died about 150 A.D.

Nī'con, SAINT, a monk, who preached in Armenia about 960 A.D., and wrote a work "On the Impious Religion of the Armenians." Died about 998.

Nī-coph'a-nēs, [Νικοφάνης,] a Greek painter, who is supposed to have lived about 300 B.C. His works are praised by Pliny in high terms.

Nic'o-phon or Nic'o-phron, [Νικοφῶν or Νικόφρων,] an Athenian comic poet, lived about 400 B.C. Only small fragments of his plays are extant.

Nicostrate. See NICOSTRATUS.

Nī-cos'tra-tus, [Gr. Νικόστρατος; Fr. NICOSTRATE, ne'ko'strȧt',] an Athenian comic poet, was a son of Aristophanes, and lived in the latter part of the fourth century B.C. His works are lost.

Nicostratus, an Athenian general, commanded in the war against the Spartans about 425 B.C. He was a colleague of Nicias in the expedition to Chalcidice.

Nicot, ne'ko', (JEAN,) a French scholar, born at Nîmes in 1530. By his merit and talents he acquired the confidence of Henry II. and his successor, and was employed as secretary of the king. On his return from an embassy to Lisbon, about 1560, he brought the tobacco-plant, which was then unknown in France, and which was named in his honour Nicotiana by the botanists. The honour of producing the first model of a French dictionary is ascribed to him. It was entitled "Treasure of the French Language," (1606.) Died in 1600.

See F. HOEFER, "Dictionnaire de Botanique pratique."

Nicou-Choron, ne'koo' sho'rôN', (STEPHANO LOUIS,) a French composer, born in Paris in 1809. His works are chiefly masses, oratorios, and other kinds of sacred music.

Niebuhr, nee'boor, (BARTHOLD GEORG,) a celebrated German historian and critic, born at Copenhagen on the 27th of August, 1776, was the son of Carstens Niebuhr, noticed below. He had a great facility for learning languages, and he read the works of Shakspeare in the original about the age of seven. In 1794 he entered the University of Kiel, where he profoundly studied Roman law, history, philosophy, and ancient languages. He was appointed secretary to Count Schimmelmann, minister of finance at Copenhagen, in 1796, made a tour in Great Britain in 1798, and became an assessor in the council of commerce at Copenhagen in 1800. In the last-named year he married Amalie Behrens. In 1806 he passed into the service of Prussia, as joint director of commerce, and in 1809 he became privy councillor and member of the commission of finances at Berlin. Although he performed these various functions with much ability and success, he soon retired from political life, and in 1810 was chosen professor of history in the University of Berlin. His lectures on Roman history, published in 1811–12, announced the important discoveries and original ideas which have effected a great revolution in the principles of Roman history, and constitute his chief title to durable celebrity.

During the war of liberation (1813) he attended the head-quarters of the allies, and was employed in negotiating loans. In 1816 he went as Prussian ambassador to Rome, where he remained until 1822 and pursued with ardour his researches in the history of ancient Rome and the study of philology. He became a resident of Bonn in 1823, and in 1825 opened there a course of lectures on history and Roman antiquities. In 1827 he published the first volume of a revised edition of his "History of Rome," ("Römische Geschichte,") which is considered the most original and profound work on ancient history that any modern has produced. The third and last volume appeared in 1832. The author died at Bonn in January, 1831, leaving a son, Marcus, who held a high position in the Prussian civil service. Niebuhr had refused several titles of nobility. His character was eminently truthful, upright, and generous. He had noble features, and a graceful facility of elocution. His attainments as a critic and philologist were of the highest order.* He spoke all the languages of Europe, and was master of the Hebrew, Greek, Arabic, and Persian. Among his principal works are an edition of the Byzantine Historians, (1828,) "Short Historical and Philological Treatises," (1828,) "Lectures on Ancient Ethnography and Geography," and "Lectures on Ancient History." In 1838 appeared an interesting collection of his Letters, with memoirs of his life, edited by Madame Hensler, ("Lebensnachrichten über B. G. Niebuhr," etc., 3 vols.) His reputation as a historian continued to increase after his death, though several of his positions are controverted by eminent critics. He rejected as fabulous many stories which other historians had credited, and aimed to construct a fabric of rational probability out of the confused mass of traditions, conjectures, and mythical legends. "He would have been the first writer of his time," says Macaulay, "if his talent for communicating truths had borne any proportion to his talent for investigating them." (Preface to "Lays of Ancient Rome.")

* The etymology of this name is uncertain. It is probably derived from a root cognate with the Anglo-Saxon hwerfan or hweorfan, to "turn," to "whirl," and gelm, (or gelmr,) a "bunch" or "mass," thus signifying the "whirling mass," (of waters.) According to Keyser, hver means a "hot spring" or "cauldron;" but the etymology is not improbably the same, the term having been applied to a boiling spring on account of the constant turning or whirling of its waters.

Niebuhr, (CARSTENS or KARSTENS,) a German traveller of distinguished talent and energy, was born at Lüdingworth, in Hanover, in 1733. He entered the Danish service as lieutenant-engineer in 1760, and was appointed by Frederick V. in 1761 to accompany a scientific expedition to Arabia. Soon after their arrival at Mocha, Von Haven, one of the company, died, and within a year Niebuhr had the misfortune to lose his three remaining companions. He now adopted the diet of the Arabians, and his health, which had previously suffered, continued good during the rest of his journey. He spent six years in the country, taking upon himself all the labours of the mission, and in 1767 returned to Denmark. His "Description of Arabia" came out in 1772. The accuracy, research, and freedom from exaggeration which characterize this production have caused it to be regarded as a standard work. In 1778 he brought out "Travels in Arabia and the Surrounding Countries." In addition to the above, he edited and published the "Flora Egyptiaco-Arabica," and "Descriptions of Animals" by Forskål, the naturalist of the expedition. Niebuhr was a councillor of state, and a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. Died in 1815.

See B. G. NIEBUHR, "Leben Carstens Niebuhr's," 1817; "Monthly Review," vol. liii., 1776, (Appendix.)

Niebuhr, von, fon nee'boor, (MARCUS,) a son of Barthold G. Niebuhr, was born at Rome about 1817. He was carefully educated by his father, who declared his determination that he should believe in the letter of the Old and New Testament, and said, "I shall nurture in him from his infancy a firm faith in all I have lost or feel uncertain about." He obtained several high offices in the Prussian government. He was opposed to the Liberal party in politics. Died in 1860.

Niederer, nee'deh-rer, (JEAN,) a Swiss teacher, born at Appenzell in 1778, published a treatise on the system of Pestalozzi. Died in 1843.

Being appointed a deputy to the Constitutional Diet, he had the principal share in drawing up the "Constitution of the 3d of May," 1791, and about the same time became one of the editors of a popular journal called "Gazeta Narodowa." After the battle of Maciejowice, he was made prisoner with Kosciusko and confined in the fortress of Saint Petersburg, from which they were released on the accession of Paul, in 1796. He accompanied Kosciusko to America in 1797, and in 1800 married Mrs. Livingston Kean, a lady of New York. He returned to Europe on the entrance of Napoleon into Poland, and when that country was united with Russia he was appointed by the emperor Alexander president of the committee of the constitution, and perpetual secretary of the senate. A short time previous to the fall of Warsaw he visited England, and then went to Paris, where he died in 1841. His principal works are "Historical Songs of Poland," "History of the Reign of Sigismund III.," "Memoirs towards the Ancient History of Poland," and "John of Tenczyn," a romance. He also wrote several dramas, which were successful, and made some translations from the English poets.

See BROCKHAUS, "Conversations-Lexikon."

* It is interesting to know that he who was perhaps the most thorough and searching of all historical critics, and whose intellect, as he tells us himself, "early took a skeptical direction," felt himself nevertheless obliged to accept the Gospel narratives as true history in all essential points. He says, "He whose earthly life and sorrows were depicted had for me a perfectly real existence, and His whole history had the same reality even if it were not related with literal exactness in any single point. Hence, also, the fundamental fact of miracles, which, according to my conviction, must be conceded, unless we adopt the not merely incomprehensible, but absurd, hypothesis that the Holiest was a deceiver and His disciples either dupes or liars, and that deceivers had preached a holy religion, in which self-renunciation is everything, and in which there is nothing tending towards the erection of a priestly rule,—nothing that can be acceptable to vicious inclinations. As regards a miracle in the strictest sense, it really only requires an unprejudiced and penetrating study of nature to see that those related are as far as possible from absurdity, and a comparison with legends, or the pretended miracles of other religions, to perceive by what a different spirit they are animated." (Niebuhr's "Letters," vol. i. p. 340, Letter 148.)

Niemeyer, nee′mī′ẹr, (AUGUST HERMANN,) a German theologian, born at Halle in 1754. He was appointed in 1799 director of the charitable institutions founded by A. H. Francke, and became in 1808 chancellor and perpetual rector of the University of Halle. He wrote educational and religious works in prose and verse, and was highly esteemed for his virtue and learning. Died in 1828.

Niemojowski, ne-êm-o-yov′skee, (JOSEPH,) a Polish patriot, born about 1760, was appointed general of the palatinate of Posnania. He was killed at the battle of Polotzk, in 1813.

Niemojowski, (VINCENT,) born near Kalisch in 1784, distinguished himself by his zeal in the cause of Poland, and held for a time the post of minister of the interior at Warsaw. Died in 1834.

Niepce, ne-ẽps′, (JOSEPH NICÉPHORE,) a French chemist and inventor of photography, born at Châlons-sur-Saône in 1765. He served in the army in 1792–95. About 1814 he began his researches on the action of light on prepared surfaces. In 1822 he obtained copies of engravings from polished metallic plates covered with a bituminous varnish. He gave the name of Héliographie to this art. He formed a partnership with Daguerre in 1829. It is stated that Niepce was the first to fix permanently images formed by the camera. Died in 1833.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Niepce de Saint-Victor, ne-ẽps′ dẹh sẽn′ vèk′tor′, (CLAUDE FÉLIX ABEL,) a French chemist and photographer, a nephew of the preceding, was born near Châlons-sur-Saône in 1805. He entered the army, in which he gained the rank of captain. Having applied himself to the task of perfecting the invention of his uncle, he announced in 1847 to the Academy of Sciences an important discovery of a method of obtaining images on glass prepared with starch or albumen. He also invented a process of heliographic engraving on metal covered with a varnish which consists chiefly of benzine. In 1854 he was appointed commandant of the Louvre. He explained his discoveries in numerous memoirs, which he published collectively under the title of "Photographic Researches," (1855.) Died in April, 1870.

Nī'o-be, [Gr. Νιόβη; Fr. NIOBÉ, ne'o'bā',] a personage of classic mythology, said to have been a daughter of Tantalus, (or, according to some authorities, of Pelops,) and the wife of Amphi'on. She was celebrated for her numerous and beautiful offspring, and had seven sons and seven daughters, or, according to some accounts, six of each. The poets relate that she was so proud of her children that she claimed superiority over Latona, (Leto,) who had borne only two. Apollo and Diana, (Artemis,) exasperated by her arrogance, slew all her children. The sons are said to have fallen by the arrows of Apollo, the daughters by those of Diana. Niobe was changed into a stone by her excessive grief. Her story was a favourite subject of the ancient poets, and has been commemorated by an admirable group of statuary, which is now at Florence, and which is variously ascribed to Praxiteles and Scopas. (See the "Iliad," book xxiv.)
